I understand how this all works, the revolving door between public office, lobbying organizations, and large corporations. I know your employment history makes turning your back on this difficult. You need to.

My generation has sat back and let a lot slide. But now you are messing with the internet. We will get our way, sooner or later. Therefore I recommend you make the strategic choice and align yourself with us. If you do you will have our loyalty for an eternity – isn't that more attractive than a cush job post-employment at the FCC.

You know I am right...

Best,

Mike Deliberto

As Internet access is now considered a human right and social communication media that use the Internet have become key enablers of freedom of speech and citizen-to-citizen communication, I believe that net neutrality should be preserved as much as practical as an underlying principle protected under any regulations that affect Internet traffic, access and connectivity.

Although providing different levels of service for "last-mile" connectivity or different bandwidth levels for hosted sites and applications seems acceptable to me, giving content providers or corporations a preference or specialized treatment on traffic handling priority or on other backbone services seems in direct conflict with the net neutrality principle and, as such, is unacceptable in my opinion.

Dear Mr. Wheeler and all members of the FCC Board,
I am the scientific director of an international collaboration that focuses on understanding and making freely accessible information on resistance to drugs crucial for treating infectious diseases of the tropics. Our principal output up until this point has been on malaria drugs.

The proposal to create two tiers on the internet, a fast one that would require payment, and a slower one for the majority of the rest of us is unacceptable. A non-profit virtual group like ours relies on internet for fast data upload, communications and all other aspects of the dissemination of this vital information.

I implore you to keep a level playing field for all users of the internet, rejecting this proposal for 2 speeds.

I was deeply disappointed to hear that the Federal Communications Commission is planning on implementing rule changes that would allow Internet service providers to pay for special, faster lanes to deliver their content. In an environment where large corporations can pay for faster service, start-ups and every day Internet users won't be able to compete and we will lose the open, free-flowing exchange of information that has made the Internet so dynamic and integral to our lives.

The FCC can ensure it has the tools to act by reclassifying broadband as a telecommunications service. I urge you to reject the new rules and to take this vital and common sense step toward protecting net neutrality.

Limits on bandwidth are ARTIFICIAL and will be proven as such in the very near future. Demands on cable infrastructure will change dramatically in the coming years and allowing communications companies to block underfunded technologies from operating is TOTAL NONSENSE.

You are giving away my power. My power to express and educate myself. With your ruling in favour of paid priority, you have removed my ability to choose what I am exposed to, shifting that choice to whomever the wealthiest corporations in the world can get to pay the most. This is utterly criminal.

Bandwidth is not a typical commodity and will soon be practically limitless. You are providing encouragement and financial incentive to those systems that restrict its' expansion and robustness. You are providing financial and monopolistic incentives to those who wish to degrade quality while increasing cost.

I urge you to vote in favor of Net Neutrality. The internet is only constrained by innovation rather than supply of bandwidth. You will prove yourself enemies of the common good and protectors of oligarchs if you continue, stunting America's potential for the whole of my lifetime.

Please keep the internet open. Net neutrality allows everyone to have equal access. Make it a public utility please! America is fast becoming a 3rd rate nation as to being informed. Bill Clinton ruined newspapers, radio, television, & banking by deregulating them. Please don't let the Wheeler name be associated with ruining our last hope for equal information. We need competition but with rich owners and corporations buying up the network, we will not be well informed. Our democracy is at stake.

Thank you.

Subject: Protect the Open Internet - Reclassify Broadband as a Communications Service Under Title II
Dear FCC,

Broadband internet service is, and has been for a long time, a communications service. In fact, I use broadband internet for very nearly ALL of my communications from telephone calls to emails, webinars and video teleconferences, both at home and at work. It is my belief that it is vital to the future of the open internet that we reclassify broadband internet service as a communications service subject to common carrier rules of Title II of the Communications Act.

There are people who say that common carrier rules will stifle innovation and investment from broadband providers, and will lead to a future where our country's broadband network languishes in a state of disrepair, similar to the current state of copper telephone service. This is nonsense. The reason for the current state of copper telephone service is not because of any act of government regulation; but because copper telephone service was supplanted years ago by better technologies like cell phones and the internet. If this is the fate of the internet, it will be because something better came along, not because of FCC imposed regulations.

America needs an open internet that is free of meddling by internet service providers (ISPs). The situation in which we find ourselves is one where television networks are run by the same corporations that also provide internet service and most American's have only one viable option for internet service. This creates a situation where ISPs have an interest in degrading the service available to their competitors in order to prop up their own offerings. This recent debacle with Netflix being charged for peering with Comcast is one example of this and proposed monthly broadband data caps by Comcast and others are another example.

I shudder to think of the state of our contry's broadband network in the coming years if something is not done now.

These vertically integrated monopolies must be reigned in through regulation. PLEASE reclassify broadband internet service as a communications service under Title II of the Communications Act and protect the future of the open internet. This is too important for us to take half measures or to leave to chance.

Sincerely

should be ashamed they are not, serving the people whom elected them. .... I THINK we live in all world where people are aware of these backhanded moves , that serve only self interest and large companies, Do NOT allow the passage of this outrageous bill! Thank you.

The internet is an integral part of our economy, democracy, and communication systems. America is absolutely dependent on an open internet operating on net neutrality principles.

Hello,

I am an American citizen who has watched the events over Net Neutrality for quite a while. I have been wary of the consequences of the direction things are headed and until very recently I have never known what I can do to try and affect things other than discuss the issues on websites. I believe that my fellow Americans and I both demand, and President Obama pledged, real net neutrality.

This requires:

- 1) FCC Chairman Tom Wheeler should resign or be removed from his position. The recent policy proposal from the FCC on net neutrality enables service providers to blackmail content providers with fees for the delivery of content that the subscriber already paid them for. Such a proposal is consistent with Wheeler's former role as head of National Cable Television Association but it is a violation of the chairman's responsibility to the public.
- 2) Internet service has become an essential tool for work, commerce, and the exercise of free speech. Broadband providers use public rights of way to string cable across the country and the space to do so is limited. Accordingly the government has an obligation to ensure that this natural monopoly is not abused. Given that the installation of internet cables is controlled by the local governments just as utilities are, it is unjust to not list them as a utility to be controlled by the government granting them this monopoly.
- 3) Almost no households in America have a more than one provider of real (> 6 mpbs) broadband internet access. The FCC has done nothing to promote competition for this critical service. I have seen statistics that of any kind of internet service options other than satellite internet, more than 99% of Americans have two or less options. This is a real problem as there is no legitimate competition between any companies and it stifles technological growth and allows for ISP's to overcharge for internet speeds that people from foreign countries can only laugh at because it is too unbelievable.
- 4) Internet Service should be regulated as a "telecommunications service". The companies that operate the network must not be allowed to discriminate regarding the physical devices connected, or the type of traffic transmitted over the network. For almost all people, there is only one high speed 'pipe' available to them. The operator should be compensated fairly for operating the pipe infrastructure but they must not be permitted to control who and what can be access or to artificially affect the throughput; just as Ma Bell was obligated to connect people wanting long distance service from Sprint and other providers.
- 5) Any network services over and above the raw transmission of data through the network should be provided by third parties; without discrimination based on content, source, or destination. There are many ISP's that are attempting to collect and sell your data to other companies which is obviously something that should be illegal as their customers have no way to stop them from doing so.
- 6) Broadband providers should be permitted to inspect traffic only for the purpose of routing it to it's intended destination and not otherwise, scan, store, forward or share it. In short, Internet Access should be treated exactly the same way that phone service was; after the dismantling of the Bell monopoly. The necessity and issues that happened around phone services at this time mirror our current situation with internet service providers and so I believe they should be regulated as Title II Telecommunication Services as that is what internet traffic at its core is just communication from one end to the other via 1's and 0's representing what is said.

Sincerely,

Thomas Molloy

Please reverse this decision. I'm skeptical that anyone is going to read this message but I'll try and voice my opinion anyway. There is no reason for companies to have to pay to get "fast lanes". Furthermore, if you don't completely understand or agree with something then don't vote YES. I'm referring to this statement:

"I would have done this differently. I would have taken the time to consider the future," said Democratic Commissioner Jessica Rosenworce.

I'm sorry to say but the voting displayed in this committee has placed a jaded outlook on democracy in general. It really looks like the internet service providers payed you off. Please reverse this decision and I thank you for your time.

In an era of massive media consolidation, the Net remains the place where all are still created equal. I urge you, indeed beg you to support Net neutrality vigorously and without ambiguity. We are counting on you.

Dear Commissioners:

I am writing to oppose changes in the net neutrality rules and ask that you consider reclassifying cable ISPs as common carriers. Cable ISPs are no different than their predecessor telephone companies, a public utility that is essential to function in modern society. I have no choice at my home address for true high speed internet other than my current provider and that provider continues to raise prices each year for service that isn't appreciable better than it was when I contracted with them initially almost 10 years ago. Very little innovation has occurred in this service and investment used to primarily increase capacity.

Cable companies are not editors and shouldn't be involved as intermediaries in consumer choice. Fast lanes will stifle innovation, make it harder for small business to compete and raise prices for consumers.

I ask that you continue current net neutrality rules and reclassify ISPs as common carriers to protect the interests of the consumer, not the multibillion dollar cable corporations.

We cannot give a few wealthy communications companies this advantage. It stops competition and gives the ordinary citizen the loss of a right guaranteed at the founding of the Internet.

What message does this send around the world about US fairness? We are imitating the worst that goes on in any country in the world.

Just another capitulation, just another sign that we do not value fairness and it will be noted worldwide, increasing the worries of smaller nations.

Are we to lose another claim that America stands for all citizens' boats to rise at the same time?

Please don't let money be a factor in who has access. Please don't sentence us to a lifetime of waiting, of swimming through hours of Comcast generated garbage to find the information we need, based on a Democratic "most used" traffic system.

I'm writing to request that the FCC reclassify Internet Service Providers as a Title Two Common Carrier.

I'm a software developer and network engineer. All of the businesses I support have come to depend on the internet. Fast and reliable internet access is more important than telephone access. Please do not put the profit motives of a few large companies over the needs of all the other businesses and citizens.

Back in the days of dial-up internet access, the average consumer had many, comparable, choices for internet access. That is no longer the case. These days, in most markets, the incumbent cable companies have a near-monopoly on high speed access (DSL is not high-speed). The cost for upstart companies ensures that it will stay this way. This is a similar situation to phone service, and deserves similar regulatory oversight.

We need to ensure Net Neutrality. Do not let big telecom companies kill the Internet for millions of people. Do not allow these companies to make huge profits at the expense of others or decide who can benefit from fast Internet speed. This would be a great shame--making millions in profit while taking the right to fast Internet speed for themselves and then slowing down or even blocking everyone else! Keep our Internet free and open!

It is simply unjust to allow big telecom companies to decide who can benefit from fast internet speed and slow down or even block everyone else, profiting in millions in the process. This is wrong and I vehemently oppose oppression and unjust profit like this. The internet must stay free and open, not to mention that if this oppression occurred, the world would be one step closer to worldwide I opposed tyranny from power.

Jack Lawson ([REDACTED]) writes:

Mr. Wheeler,

The "Paid Priority" plan is extremely flawed, and is dangerous to a massive source of innovation and economic growth in the United States. Internet providers provide a service that under any less outwardly corrupt administration would consider to be a Title II Common Carrier. Your proposal allows carriers to choose which traffic to provide "fast lanes" to, giving priority to existing and embedded companies and putting at a disadvantage small businesses and startups who need a common pipe to compete fairly. This gives too much power to the telecom industry to choose which internet companies fail and succeed.

We've already seen how some ISPs purposefully slow down legal content, such as Netflix and Torrents; because these technologies can compete with them, they have no qualms about abusing their position when possible. Your proposal is entirely to their benefit and against the benefit of the consumers you are supposed to protect.

Consider that the damage this will do to the United States - which is already *far behind* other countries because of telecom monopolies - will be on your name. You will be known in history as the corrupt FCC chairman who worked to destroy the internet in the name of short-term telecom profits.

There is an alternate future, where you are the one who enforced net neutrality and ushered in an age of economic prosperity and friendliness to small companies and startups.

Choose the correct choice for your conscience and your country.

The internet should not be corporately owned. It is for the people, and should be owned equally by the people, not some corporation "trying to regulate it" while actually restricting the openness and access to the people while secretly just trying to make more unnecessary money. Leave the internet alone.

Allowing internet service providers to create internet “fast lanes” and “slow lanes” would do nothing more than allow them to extort payments from companies like Netflix. It’s time to admit that the internet is a public utility, not a private “service.”

Tom Wheeler

Dear Chairman Wheeler:

I am writing today to urge you to reject Chairman Tom Wheeler's proposal to allow internet service providers (ISP) to charge different rates for faster access to websites willing to pay, or to allow any discretion on the part of ISPs to manage the flow of information on the internet based on who the information provider is, or their willingness to pay for access.

The internet was founded on the principle of net neutrality. And the success of that principle speaks for itself. There is no reason to allow ISPs to manage the flow of information on the internet to maximize their profits to the detriment of every other stakeholder in the internet.

Please reject Chairman Wheeler's proposal, and any other proposal that diverges from the principle of net neutrality.

Sincerely,

Keep our freedom of speech free. The internet is our newest line of communication and the world deserves equal access not based on what information providers will pay to have that information passed to the consumer. Ultimately that cost WILL be passed to us the consumer. Of course this will eliminate by frustration, unavailability and cost the continued innovation created by the internet until now. The internet is infrastructure critical to our economy! TREAT IT AS SUCH!!! Do not even consider this proposal. KEEP our Internet free and open .

Dear Mr. Wheeler,

An open and neutral internet is essential to a free market economy. Please do not give big company is an unfair advantage that they do not need. It is small companies that foster innovation and progress. Allowing big companies faster internet speeds while throttling speed for consumers and smaller companies seems like a very un-American way of doing business. The Internet should be a free and open medium, and consumers should have unfettered access to its entirety. Please don't do this, you know it's not what the consumers, and more importantly, the American people want.

Mr. Tom Wheeler,

ISPs compete directly with companies like Netflix to provide entertainment media. It is a terrible precedent to state that it is OK for a company to degrade the quality of their competitor's service. What other industry would this be tolerated in? Could Wendy's get into the construction business and create fast lines for their drive through traffic and slow down McDonald's drive through traffic? Hell no.

The only reason it is able to happen here is because the mainstream public opinion is not well educated enough to oppose it and because proponents of the idea have more resources than those who oppose it.

There's not enough competition for ISPs. Look at the customer satisfaction rates of the ISP giants Comcast and Time Warner. They're not doing a great job making anyone happy and yet you're about to grant them additional responsibilities and more power.

ISPs need to be reclassified as common carriers. For a period of time when dial up was the method for connecting to the internet - it essentially was a utility because it's infrastructure was provided over a utility infrastructure. Only when the medium was improved/replaced did this really change. If phone providers could have set limits on the connection speeds (28.8k vs 56k over the same phone line - the same wire) and charge for the faster speeds don't you think they would have? Thankfully the American people were protected from this. Do not remove that protection.

Subject: Save Net Neutrality!
I believe Net Neutrality is important to maintain fairness amongst large corporations and small businesses (I work for a medium-sized software company), so that young companies like mine have as level of a playing field as those with greater power within the market. Taking away Net Neutrality will surely stagnate the growth of the booming software/technology industry in the U.S., and I hope that you will recognize my message in opposition towards any sort of bill that will limit internet access based on "paid prioritization," or the like. I am opposed to any type of bill that will reduce the current neutrality of the Internet, including the one being proposed right now.

Thank you for listening,

Dear Congress and United States Government,

We abhor the corporate masters to which you skulk over the Net Neutrality issue. Utilitize the Internet and no one will need it delivered any faster than the next person when everyone has the exact same regulated speed. You are now setting a standard akin to mobsterism and racketeering. The deliver of water, electricity, gas or any other utility to my home should be no different than Internet.

This is just an excuse for the already few corporation that provide Internet service to Americans and companies to extort more money from us all. We are tired of this scam and lack of competition in the Internet marketplace. Everywhere but the US has countless ISP competitors, low prices and far faster speed than what is offered to consumers in the US. Allowing companies to do this will kill the Internet in the US and incur the wrath of the American populous.

Vote to solidify absolute Net Neutrality, make illegal any fast lanes, and open up competition to other providers to lower our already inflated Internet prices. Utilitize and regulate Internet service similar to water, gas, electricity and other similar utilities to secure America's Internet independence.

Subject: FCC Ruling on Internet Fast Lanes
Chairman and commissioners,

I am writing to you as a concerned member of the public, requesting you to reconsider your current actions in voting to allow 'fast lanes' for the Internet. There is already a very poor amount of choice in the current broadband market; many of us have only one or two choices when it comes to a provider. New providers are unable to enter the market due to the sheer cost of laying wire or the inability to do so due to the current providers suing, bribing or otherwise fighting them at every step. Monthly bills consistently go up on a service that should be getting cheaper over time, not more expensive. To add to this insult, one of (if not the) largest provider in the nation is now talking of instituting data caps for its users.

As the officials responsible for regulation of this infrastructure, I urge you to strongly consider the current infrastructure for reclassification as common carriers. The current ISPs are making obscene amounts of profit from this nation's citizens, and many of us rely on their service for our daily lives and businesses. Science is only moving forward, not back; this country and its economy will only become more dependent on these technologies, not less. Reclassification of services like phone lines is the reason every citizen in this country has cheap, affordable long distance calls.

I cannot emphasize how personally angry and disappointed I am to see today's vote. Do what is right for your country. I will be voting in favor of any officials that will work to make the above a reality, and will be urging and educating my friends and family to do the same.

Again, Big Business is trying to control something in order to increase profits. When will we stand up and look at things in the light of day. When will corporations realize that the more you control a populace the bigger the blow back. This is the kind of thinking that creates the need for revolt. Don't they realize that greed is not the answer. You can't take any of these gains, through screwing the common people, with you. If we all write our congressmen and senators, and tell them, that they will be out of a job if they do not comply to our wishes. Put a stop to this kind of take over or get fired. It is too bad we don't have a president, in the style of Teddy Roosevelt, who has enough BALLS to bring out the big stick in his hand, and not have his hand in the pocket of Big Business and their one percent stock holders.

The Internet is meant to be a place of freedom and equality. Allowing big companies to pay for bigger band widths would destroy this equality and instill a "pay-to-win" system on the entire Web.

Internet neutrality is the most vibrant institution in support of a free democratic community in a time when government institutions are failing and confidence in our free and open culture is at an all-time low. It is vital that we keep the Internet open and neutral to support free enterprise, public debate and democracy. The Internet is in the class of a public utility and should be regulated as such. To allow a few giant corporations to profit from restricting the free flow of information is against all that America stands for. I sincerely trust in you to do the right thing by our democratic principles and keep the Internet neutral. Thank you.

Subject: CRIMINALIZE PAID PRIORITY ACCESS TO THE NET- DO YOU JOB TO PROTECT THIS COUNTRY AGAINST ATTACKS ON NET NEUTRALITY

I (and most of this country) am disgusted that the FCC is considering allowing any company to destroy the neutrality of the Net by charging for priority access. This must be stopped immediately..

Your job is to protect Net Neutrality, Civil Liberties and entrepreneurialism not to sell the people of this country downstream to big companies that can give your fat cat bosses lucrative jobs after they leave the FCC.

Chairman Wheeler should be ashamed of himself for even considering these proposals (under the guise of "clarification of the regulations after the recent court ruling on the matter") and should resign if he approves them.

Trying to avoid the issue by stating that you do not have authority over such nefarious ISP plans because they are an "information service" is merely a meaningless politically motivated distinction manufactured to give the FCC the illusion of official helplessness and (IM)plausible deniability.

You have the power to reclassify broadband internet access as a "Telecommunications Service" under Title II and block these deals- do this or get out of the way and let some other body less conflicted by money and political power do the job you are paid to do.

Even your proposal to allow cable companies to charge for these services but subject to a "reasonableness test" oversight is nothing more than a transparent attempt to give the internet to big companies what they want via the backdoor - as we all know the FCC and most government agencies are in the thrall big corporate interests. Even our elected officials are owned by them. No one in this country is fooled by these transparent, desperate attempts of the FCC to hide the massively improper influence of big business on its decisions. Rather than rejecting these heinous plans outright, the FCC appears to be twisting itself into a pretzel in order to try and accommodate predatory big business interests by any means possible.

At present there are no rules to protect the Open Internet. We need such rules immediately to protect against the attempts of predatory corporations to own the Internet.

This is your Shining Moment to do the right thing and protect this country, our liberties and freedoms. The FCC is at a crossroads. Your credibility and moral authority are on the line.

Which way will you turn?

The World is watching.

Democracy thrives on diversity of opinions, and a free and open internet gives an opportunity to everybody an opportunity to voice their opinions, irrespective of whether they are rich enough to buy high-speed internet.

I think it should be our top priority to keep the net open and neutral.

Please do not allow these monopolistic corporations to further control the playing field. It's already more or less impossible to start a new ISP in this country because of the predatory practices of these companies. Now you're considering allowing them to strangle the internet itself?

As a small internet business owner, it is vital to stop ISPs from controlling the speed of people accessing my web sites, and others like me. Allowing internet service providers to create internet "fast lanes" and "slow lanes" would do nothing more than allow them to extort payments from companies like mine. It is shameful that the Director of the FCC has taken this ill-advised course in dereliction of his duty. He must be removed from his position, immediately. Shame on him for lending his power to corporate greed!!!

America's true strength lies in the ability of it's citizens to innovate. That's what made us the world power we are. The internet has been a strong player in growing that ability over the last 20 years. Handing the internet over to giant corporations isn't only taking away from it's citizens it's weakening for America as a whole.

Allowing internet service providers to create internet “fast lanes” and “slow lanes” would do nothing more than allow them to extort payments from companies like Netflix. It’s time to admit that the internet is a public utility, not a private “service.”

A vote against Internet Neutrality is (and will always be) a vote FOR government control of free access, and a vote FOR Corporate control of access, period. Any vote that alters free access, and thus any legislator who casts that vote, shall forever represent an enemy of the very Bill of Rights that forms the essence of this issue. It will be my true pleasure to publicize and continue to publicize every Texas legislator who supports such a blatant sellout of fundamental US principles.

Even if this measure fails and a new one takes its place next year, I hope the idea of holding the world-wide networks hostage for ransom remains a purely American idea pushed by a bunch of gunslinger profiteers in the corporate economy! These people, and the way they think will not go away, and their continuing criminal mindset will only grow. This is why the FCC needs to distance itself from this idea or risk losing all credibility in all first-world nations and the entire globe. The entire planet has its own telecom issues to deal with, they will not know anything about the FCC except that Mr Wheeler has never stopped working for the American ISP's. To the entire planet, the FCC must look as if it has been taken over by thugs! Ending this measure will not be enough, Wheeler needs to step down and quit the FCC.

I support net neutrality because I believe the Internet should be available to everyone. Not everyone in the United States can afford access with good browsing speeds that don't cap bandwidth. To give the power of Internet access to ISPs who consider their consumers bottomless wallets is immoral and unfair.

Subject: Another argument regarding net neutrality

As I'm sure you are all being bombarded by these messages, I will be brief. Permitting "Fast lanes", as the rules would currently, is tantamount to sticking a poisoned dart into the veins of every mom and pop start up company in existence. Not only will you prevent new technology from getting a foothold, but these rules will effectively stall the need for any sort of ingenuity or forward thinking in technology.

Netflix is netflix because it had a great idea and made it happen, not because it had the deepest pockets. Your rules, as written, will effectively destroy the "next" netflix, or the "next" facebook from every coming to fruition.

Please consider the fact that you are HURTING development in technology, communication, and any of a variety of other fields.

I thank you for your time,

To Chairman Tom Wheeler and the FCC Commissioners—

To the FCC—
Please build any net neutrality argument upon solid legal standing. Specifically, this means reclassifying broadband under Title II of the Telecommunications Act of 1934.

706 authority from the Telecommunications Act has been repeatedly struck down in court after legal challenges by telecom companies. Take the appropriate steps to prevent this from happening again.

Sincerely,

Bernard Robke

Dear FCC,

Please consider that the future of America will not be served by allowing a few giants to limit the speed of our Internet. If anything we should be urgently looking for ways to provide faster service to all. The US is falling behind its Asian and Northern European neighbors in providing faster Internet speed to their citizens! As I heard recently, "the Internet is the new sandbox of creativity" and we are stifling it. This is where new ideas and technologies are developed. We need to be at the front!

The Internet must stay free and open!! For the good of us all!

I am upset and would like to stop the corporate Internet takeover.

The proposal in front of the FCC would allow Comcast, AT&T and other big telecom companies to decide who can benefit from fast Internet speed -- while slowing down, or even blocking, everyone else -- and making millions in profit from it!

Our democracy depends on equal access to data on the internet. This is how I do my research to find out who to vote for, or what issues to advocate for. We NEED access to the information on the internet!

To Chairman Tom Wheeler and the FCC Commissioners-----

Allowing the giant Telecoms and internet service providers to create internet "fast lanes" and "slow lanes" would do nothing more than allow them to extort payments from companies like Netflix. It would slow innovation and creativity that comes from the vital start-ups such as we have seen the likes of so far with Google, etc. It's time to admit that the internet is a public utility, not a private "service."

Please keep the internet open and free. I support Net Neutrality. I do not believe companies should be allowed to receive higher pay for faster service. Everyone should have free access to the highest possible speed internet. I already do not agree with charging end-consumers additional for a faster connection to the data. And I certainly do not support the new proposals of also charging providers for access to a "fast lane" for their data. Everyone loses if this happens.

Net Neutrality is the only thing that makes sure to give smaller developers the opportunity to start an innovative online idea. Facebook was, at one point, a small company... if it weren't for net neutrality, larger competing companies could have sped up their own internet speed by paying communications companies like verizon... From the customer's point of view, even if the product is better than the larger company's product, the customer will most likely choose the faster product from the larger company... Taking away net neutrality will likely hinder innovation on the internet... The internet is perhaps the greatest resource at humanity's disposal, but hindering its innovation will certainly dispose of the internet.

Please build any net neutrality argument upon solid legal standing. Specifically, this means reclassifying broadband under Title II of the Telecommunications Act of 1934.

706 authority from the Telecommunications Act has been repeatedly struck down in court after legal challenges by telecom companies. Take the appropriate steps to prevent this from happening again.

The internet is a free, open thing that has changed the entire world. It is the cornerstone of my business, www.nulionphotography.com<<http://www.nulionphotography.com>> , and with this new ruling that you folks seem to be trying to push through, the playing field would become completely uneven and unequal, skewed, as most things in America are, towards huge business interests that have far more money than We The People do.

Do the right thing, and side with THE PEOPLE on this issue. Reclassify ISP's such as Verizon and Comcast as common carriers, so that they can't threaten the internet again.

Please, as a business owner and a longtime user and appreciator of the free and open internet, do NOT allow for the creation of "fast lanes".

Please support Net Neutrality! The Internet should be a democratic space, free and open to everyone equally. When Avaaz and partner organisations brought their million signatures to his office, FCC Chief commissioner Tom Wheeler was quick to support an open Internet. We cannot allow the FCC and Wheeler to cave now to pressure from private companies who would profit from this proposal. Brazil and the EU have already passed legislation supporting Net Neutrality. The US should be at the forefront of the movement to support an open Internet. The FCC must not only oppose this dangerous proposal, but pass legislation for Net Neutrality to support and protect a free and open Internet for all. Thank you.

Any measure that would allow internet service providers to charge companies more to deliver web content faster and more reliably is wrong. The internet ought to be an open platform where any business, big or small, has equal access. Anything that restricts equal access will ultimately cause harm and will effect the ability of smaller internet firms to compete against larger ones. Please do not enact any measure that aids in restricting access to content on the internet.

The internet is quite literally the last bastion of freedom humanity has.

If you try and take that from them, you do so at great detriment to all of your fellow human beings, save the small number working at the ISPs.

I know you are not an evil human being bent on world domination. I know most of us are just people trying to get through their day, and take care of their friends and family.

But you need to listen to your conscience. Net neutrality is absolutely integral to the future of humanity.

The internet has brought us all together, bypassing nationalist boundaries and giving us a sense of connection to people we've never seen or heard from, and likely never would have on our own.

Please, do not take any steps that could put that in jeopardy for the sake of bottom line profits for a few corporations.

Humanity is worth more, and you know we are.

Do what you said you would do. Uphold net neutrality. Make it illegal and let everyone know it is morally unconscionable to do otherwise.

Be our hero and not our villain.

Subject: Net Neutrality

In these dangerous days in America - where our government leaders are now bought-and-paid-for by the highest bidder - easy and fast access to the internet is CRUCIAL for FREEDOM to continue to exist in America.

This is not a joke. All Americans should be allowed to assemble and share ideas, even if that is done via the internet. Hello! That's even in the American Bill of Rights!

The 1% should not be allowed to be the only people to have access to the Fast Lane. That is ridiculous.

Come on! Is there NO ONE left in the U.S. Government willing to stand up for the Average American?! Why the hell do Europe and other developed nations have such better internet access than the United States?! Is every government official THAT CORRUPT, THAT GREEDY that you're willing to CRAP on Americans?! Have you no SHAME? Have you NO AMERICAN PRIDE?

I get why the 1% wants to hog the internet, it's to PREVENT information from being shared and is the easiest way they can protect THEIR interests. This is about what best for ALL of AMERICA, not just American's with money.....DO THE RIGHT THING for a change!

Subject: Please reclassify ISPs as Title II Common Carriers
To whom it may concern,

I was incredibly displeased to hear today that a "slow lane" paid priority plan was approved today by the FCC. As an internet user and consumer, I am deeply invested in the status of our internet and online telecommunications. The decision to allow paid priority on the Internet to me indicates that ISPs will end up being paid more money to provide the services they already do. In a capitalist society, I should have to choice between different ISPs if the one I have is throttling bandwith from content providers (which currently happens to me, my ISP throttles my data between peak hours and I have no other ISP to choose from) but many internet users do not have a choice of ISP. This means that paid priority will only serve to consolidate power in the hands of a few small ISPs. As a consumer, I already feel like I don't have any choice among ISPs and I don't feel protected.

Not to mention, major ISPs have already taken $200 billion in tax money from the American people to upgrade infrastructure, a deal that was never completed (more information here<http://www.newnetworks.com/ShortSCANDALSummary.htm>). There is no indication to me as a consumer that increased profits or revenue to an ISP will result in better internet service as a whole. America already has worse internet speeds than most of Europe and yet pays a much higher cost. I urge the FCC to support consumers and reclassify ISPs as Title II Common Carries.

Andrew Erhart

Good Afternoon Mr Wheeler,

In light of the proposed changes in regulation of the Internet, and allowing a 2 speed Internet, or a Paid Priority.

PLEASE do not move forward in allowing this to happen, for many reasons, none of which would benefit the majority of businesses or users.

This will financially trickle down to meaning higher costs, less access for those with smaller pockets, businesses, and individuals.

Without taking more of your time, I am being brief on the reasons.

I am an IT Professional, and do not see a positive outcome from this proposal.

Thank You,

To Whom it May Concern:

The proposed rules change that will allow internet providers to charge more for faster access to customers is yet another step toward internet ownership by large corporations. It is not just a matter of semantics-when advertisers can pay for quicker access, by definition, the rest are receiving slower access. You might not like the fast lane/slow lane analogy but that is exactly what it is. Our elections, and therefore the government, are already being sold to the highest bidder.

If our society loses equal access to information, that means the information itself is being sold. Please preserve net neutrality. After global warming, this is the most important facing our society. Thank you.

I am what you would call a "NERD" or "Geek". I know how the internet works inside and outside. I know that power of the internet and how it has change the world. If we limit the speed we are just damming our capacity to innovate.

Currently the internet is cheaper and faster in Japan, Australia, and other Asian countries. These countries know that the internet connectivity is a great factor in keeping up with today's market growth.

Comcast, Verizon and the other ISP only want to nickel and dime their customers. They have gotten millions of tax dollars and still have fail to create an internet infrastructure that rivals current foreign infrastructures. We even have Comcast and Time Warner running afraid of the big move that Google Fiber is pushing.

Fast lanes or Priority Pay services is how the United States will stay behind in technology.

Today's vote to approve a plan to allow paid priority lanes for the internet directly effects the future of the internet in a negative way. As an american citizen and a registered voter, I believe this plan is greatly flawed and does not take into consideration the economical impact of the plan. The future of the internet will be greatly degraded if this plan is approved. This does not level the playing field for small and up and coming websites. The plan will greatly affect the consumer by passing on cost of a "paid lane" to the end user. I am writing with great displeasure on the results of the vote. After all the research i have done, i do not believe this plan will benefit american in anyway. I believe the plan will hinder innovation for future generations. Today we took two steps backwards. Communications delivered through the internet should not be throttled or specially prioritized. The "Fast Lane" plan is slick politics to creating a "Slow Lane." When only those who can negotiate and pay for the "Fast Lane" option have their packets sped up, the net effect is a perception of slowness. While packets may not have slowed down, the perception they are slower compared to the "Fast Lane" will be very real. Perception is reality.

One of two things needs to happen

- 1) If ISPs wish to maintain local market monopolies (like utility companies), they need to be classified as common carriers. There is little cross over competition between Verizon + Comcast where true broadband is at stake. In Naperville, IL - Comcast is the ONLY option for high speed (read 50MB or higher) internet. They should be nothing more than a fat-dumb-pipe carrying packets of information. In this fashion, data can be fully metered if the ISPs desire. However, there should not be a bundle starting at 300GB for $X, then $Y per 50 GB more. It should simply be $Z per GB. The same as water, electricity, gas, all other utilities. Minimum speed classes should be guaranteed.
- 2) ISPs should lose their local market monopolies allowing municipalities to create local fiber networks, Google Fiber to more easily expand, and market cross penetration to happen. This would foster true competition allowing the market, not a few CEOs to decide what is wanted / needed.

Subject: Keep the Internet Open and Equal!

This email may not actually get read, but here are my thoughts on the proposed "fast lane" rules.

1. Keep the internet open and equal! I pay Comcast over $80 a month for my internet usage. For that I get slightly faster than normal download speeds and get to enjoy a 300G data cap each month. I believe that for my money, I should not also have to pay more to access certain sites. At this point it looks like the FCC rules only effect content providers, like Netflix, but it's not a large leap to see how those providers and ISPs will pass their opportunity to make more money on to me and increase my fees as well.
2. Make data caps illegal. Again, I pay a fee to use the internet and for the 300G of data I can use each month. I do not get to roll over my unused data for the next month. I should not have to also pay more for going over a data cap that has no foundation as a problem of bandwidth. Comcast uses this to make more money, not due to some necessity. If I pay for access, I should get unlimited access.
3. Protect the consumer! I am a virtual worker and depend on the internet for my job. I believe the internet should be a public utility and that it should be regulated, just like my household utilities. If I cannot get the internet, or my lone ISP prices me out of its usability due to my not being able to afford a fast lane, my livelihood will be threatened.

Thank you for your time and attention to my opinion on the issue.

Hi Tom,

I just want to add one more name to the list of people extremely unhappy with the proposed plan to allow 'internet fast lanes'. All this will do will allow ISPs another way to increase profits by diminish the quality of service. The US is already falling behind a great deal of other developed countries in internet connection speed. Moving forward internet connections will be a utility. Utilization of the connectivity allowed by increased speeds is only now in its infancy. What our children and grandchildren do will shock us. The same way electricity change from being an alternative light source, to an integral part of modern society, so will connectivity in the future.

Subject: Net Neutrality
I am very concerned about the proposed "net neutrality" rules. I would prefer that ISPs were reclassified as common carriers. It just makes sense.

American ISPs exist in a near monopoly in almost all parts of the country. This alone already gives them the unbalanced control of an important resource to America and its people. A resource that is at least an entertainment venue for Americans but at most a critical part of research and development to many American companies.

Lets ignore for a second that most of us pay for advertised unlimited data transfer that is actually limited. We pay for advertised speeds that we do not get. We pay for access to the entire "internet". If these rules go into effect the ISPs will get to define what part of the internet we get access to and at what speeds. There is no reason for ISPs to not to create a tiered internet. It is free money from their point of view.

I don't think that Comcast or Verizon will deliberately "slow" access to content. Why would they. They just have to let the equipment they have in place continue to age. Without competition ISPs have no incentive to upgrade the equipment anyway. This is one of the reasons our internet speeds are so slow, and our costs are so high, compared to the rest of the world. Then ISPs can offer/force content providers a faster lane to deliver content. (Content the ISPs are already charging the American people the right to access mind you.) Then we have a two-tiered internet.

How will the next Google, Apple, or Facebook get into the "fast lane" at start up. They won't be able to. This will have a chilling effect on the digital entrepreneurial growth that is happening right now. Telecommunication lines are no different than freeways, shipping lanes, and rail lines. They are part of a critical infrastructure and should be regulated as such.

Thank you,

Subject: Net neutrality is not negotiable.
To whom it may concern,

If you are reading this Mr. Wheeler, I applaud your dedication to hearing the public's opinion on this matter. If someone else is aggregating opinions for you, I can save a bit of reading and state that ALL ISPs should be treated as utilities so that we can put this to rest.

Internet providers refuse to compete with each other. The FCC's own broadband coverage map shows that most areas have only one or maybe two providers if you're lucky. Comcast is planning to add data caps to all users, not because of network congestion but simply to charge for overages. The profit goes to their shareholders, very little is reinvested in the network so all users get to pay more for the same service, year over year. This is not going to get better.

Now let's talk about internet fast lanes. If broadband providers have extra capacity walled off to provide fast lanes (very unlikely), that's a slap in the face to users that are constantly getting less than advertised speeds. If they don't have extra capacity (very likely), the plan is to slow down ALL NETWORK TRAFFIC to add a separate "lane" for higher paying customers. Explain to me how this benefits anyone but the broadband provider?

Last, we have the conflict of interest. Most broadband providers are also cable TV providers. Unfortunately for them, many people are cancelling cable TV service (myself included) and switching to streaming services which have no commercials. This is how the free market should work, consumers use services that provide better value. What is stopping broadband providers from universally charging both streaming providers and users extra simply to make up for lost cable TV revenue? Nothing. I assure you, this is the idea behind the "fast lane".

If the internet is not protected as an open, equal, and above all, essential part of our lives, everyone will suffer for it. Data has surpassed telephone service in importance, treat it as such.

To whom it may concern,

I live in Silver Spring, MD and am writing to ask the FCC to reclassify Internet Service Providers as Title Two Common Carriers.

I am strongly opposed to the creation of fast lane agreements. These fast lane agreements have the potential to stifle Internet users' freedom of speech and limit the creation of Internet based innovations. Network neutrality is critical for both the free flow of information and to promote innovation and economic productivity.

I believe the FCC should take the necessary actions to reclassify broadband Internet access services as "telecommunications services" from "information services." This move will place ISPs under the "common carrier regulations" of Title II of the Communications Act of 1934. According to the non-partisan Congressional Research Service, Common Carrier regulations will provide the FCC the necessary authority to enact and enforce network neutrality rules.

Heather Ovelmen

To whom it may concern,

Over the last two decades, humanity has seen a massive explosion in arts, culture, debate, and of course, technology. It is directly a result of our ability to instantly and globally communicate and share with one another via the Internet. Anything which would allow one organization the option to reach customers on unequal terms will slow down and possibly halt the progress that has been achieved. This would be a horrible situation for businesses, governments, NGOs, and individuals. Please do not allow this to occur.

The Internet is just as vital to commerce, research, and art as any other public infrastructure. As this is National Infrastructure Week, please consider the impact that unequal content distribution would have on the next Facebook, edX, or Amazon.com.

Do not let lobbyists create bad policy. The Internet has always been fully open, and has done great things. Do not make a huge mistake by changing it.

Consumers already pay for unlimited access at a given speed, and already get less than they pay for. This is a money grab / give-a-way for telecom companies which depend on a privileged position from the people to make their monopoly profits. Their monopolies come at a price = regulation in the PUBLIC interest.

My comments are as follows:

Open Internet: time to end the free ride

1. The interstate highway rights of way were made available for installation of the fiber optic backbone for the Internet. The transportation infrastructure has been used to generate billions of dollars in profits for private investors, but there has been no repayment for the use of the transportation infrastructure. Our infrastructure is deteriorating and needs a new source of funding, since the fuel-efficient vehicles are generating less gas tax revenue. The FCC and DOT Inspector Generals should work together to develop a solution to insure that some of the revenue generated by fiber optic cables on the interstate highway rights of way are returned to transportation programs.

2. Google has acquired a large percentage of the dark fiber along the interstate, without paying sales tax on the transactions to the states, and without listing it as taxable personal property to the applicable counties and without paying income tax to the states for the revenue generated.

Subject: REINSTATE NET NEUTRALITY

While it certainly would benefit the larger companies like Time Warner, this internet "fast lane" plan that you are pushing so hard destroys everything that is great about the internet. Now, anybody can start a website to talk about something that they feel passionate about. Any startup, no matter how small or how poor, can create a website without worrying about whether or not people will be able to load their site quickly. While it doesn't explicitly allow for "fast lane" policies, it certainly doesn't forbid them either. If we can learn anything from the sub-prime mortgage crisis, it's that if a company can turn a profit they will try to do so regardless of the risk or pain it may cause. Since an ISP can make more money by instituting such fast lane policies and signing deals with companies like Netflix and Amazon (to ensure that they get in the fast lane), there is absolutely no reason for them not to. However this would stifle small business and smaller companies who cannot afford to pay those fees. It's tantamount to class warfare, and it's wholly antithetical to the American ideals of small businesses and innovative people with great ideas rising from abject poverty to success.

I urge you to reconsider your stance on Net Neutrality and to introduce language that specifically forbids ISPs and other providers from privileging certain websites over others.

Dear Commissioner,

The future of the open Internet is in your hands. And yet you have proposed rules that would actually break it.

Your proposed path would open the door to widespread discrimination online. It would give Internet service providers the green light to implement pay-for-priority schemes that would be a disaster for startups, nonprofits and everyday Internet users (including yourself) who cannot afford these unnecessary tolls.

I urge you to scrap these proposed rules and instead restore the principle of online nondiscrimination by reclassifying broadband as a telecommunications service.

My comments are as follows:

Open Internet: time to end the free ride

1. The interstate highway rights of way were made available for installation of the fiber optic backbone for the Internet. The transportation infrastructure has been used to generate billions of dollars in profits for private investors, but there has been no repayment for the use of the transportation infrastructure. Our infrastructure is deteriorating and needs a new source of funding, since the fuel-efficient vehicles are generating less gas tax revenue. The FCC and DOT Inspector Generals should work together to develop a solution to insure that some of the revenue generated by fiber optic cables on the interstate highway rights of way are returned to transportation programs.

2. Google has acquired a large percentage of the dark fiber along the interstate, without paying sales tax on the transactions to the states, and without listing it as taxable personal property to the applicable counties and without paying income tax to the states for the revenue generated.

I writing to you in protest of your vote today to create an Internet Fast Lane. I pay my internet service provider to have access to any packets of data that I want, and then I pay netflix to stream movie packets of data that I want to watch. My internet service provider should not have the right to regulate which packets of data I can receive at what speeds. In reality, I am now being double charged because netflix will have to have to pay my ISP for a faster connection, which they will of course pass on some of the costs to its consumers. I don't see it can be fair for an ISP to indirectly regulate my internet usage by controlling the speeds at which content is delivered when I pay them to have access to all of the internet. Thank you for you time, and I hope you reconsider the stance of the FCC.

Subject: Appeal for An Open Internet

As a consumer I pay my ISP for a specific service which is a connection to a vast wealth of content.

It turns out that running a business and offering a service typically involves expenses. This includes managing their network, peering, etc.

It also means that because of their anti-competitive behavior and the lack of meaningful competition they should be relegated to being common carriers and nothing more.

There is a tremendous conflict of interest when they offer their own services and engage in behavior to stifle competing services. ISPs need to be positioned as 'dumb pipes' or barriers need to be eliminated to enable legitimate competition in this space.

For many people it's one thing when companies with deep pockets like Netflix are targeted.

What happens to small businesses, software-as-a-service companies and hobbyists when this expands to include them and they can't pay so their connection gets degraded? What about resources like Wikipedia--what happens if they can't pay Comcast?

There are lots of good reasons for net neutrality and designation of ISPs as common carriers.

There aren't very many good reasons for ISPs to be allowed to continue their strange hold on what should be available as a household utility.

Do you have any sense of obligation to represent the will of the people?

You do realize that your actions communicate that you have been bought and paid for by the cable industry?

You need to reclassify broadband internet providers as TITLE II common carriers. Netflix has already been FORCED to pay Verizon and Comcast fees because Verizon and Comcast refuse to make needed upgrades to their infrastructure.

Subject: A Teired/"fast lane" internet is NOT net neutrality

Internet cost in the US is already one of the most in the world thanks to little completion by ISP's. If they are allowed to add cost to the content providers that will simply be passed along to the subscribers anyway. Regardless it will be the ISP double dipping and the consumer paying more than what they pay now. I see no win for the consumer if this is allowed. As a conservative I am typically against expansion of regulation. However, ISP's have proven that even as prices and profits have gone up, services have been degraded unless content providers pay a fee. As detailed by the graph below Netflix speeds were throttled by Comcast, soon to be the largest Internet provider, until a pay for speed deal was signed. Since then Netflix charges have been raised by a dollar or 11%. Thus the only option to keep the internet innovating and open the commission must choose a title II reclassification and change the internet as a utility.

Mr. Wheeler,

I am writing this email in response to your latest proposal that essentially guts and destroys the free and open internet as we have come to know it. The internet is an essential part of how we communicate and do business and is only poised to become even more essential. To treat the telecom companies anything other than common carriers would be one of the most anti-consumer and anti-competitive decisions that could be made. I don't want a future of the internet where I have to pay $50/month for the 'basic' internet package, plus an extra $30/month for the 'social media' package, plus an extra $30/month for the 'sports' package, plus an extra $40/month for the 'streaming video' package. All that plus massive fees for overages and 'roaming' on the internet would severely limit any normal person's ability to use the internet. You and I both know exactly what this is, special treatment for these massive Telcos, and nothing more.

Not to mention, how horrible this would be for competition and startups. I am not an entrepreneur or planning on starting a company, but I can see the writing on the wall. The precedent is already there with Netflix caving to Comcast's greed. This horrible precedent can still be reversed if you have the courage to stand against the Telcos and their money. Please think of the average person. The internet should not be a walled garden only available to the richest companies and individuals.

Thank you for you time.

ISPs should not be given the power to discriminate content by providers. It is, after all, the public demand for content, not the content provided by any specific companies, that is increasing our need for a more robust infrastructure that the ISPs have been unwilling to build. Allowing ISPs to discriminate in any way content from different providers will have a stagnating effect on the development of a faster, more open internet which the US will need in order to remain competitive in nearly all forms of future innovation.

We aren't asking for much, just some fair representation when competing against massive, multi-billion dollar organizations.

But no, we can't have that can we? Nope, you've just gone right on ahead and decided to allow companies to charge for faster internet, which if you haven't been paying attention is incredibly slow compared to other nations, AND GETTING SLOWER!

That's all well and good though right? I mean, your lobbyist and cable company cronies get what they want, more money for less service, because that's exactly how this country got so good to begin with, you know putting the wants of the few in front of the needs of the many?

You're a pathetic excuse for a Government Organization and you should be ashamed of yourselves. It's sickening to me to know that people like you are in charge of the future of our country. I am writing as a concerned citizen of the internet. The internet deserves to be open and free as it was intended. Please do not let corporate interests take precedence over the open and free flow of information. Please reclassify internet service providers as title two common carriers. I pay for a service to use that service as I see fit. ISPs should have no more right to dictate how fast the services I use on the internet get to me, anymore than the electric company can tell me how to use the power that comes into my house. I am already paying for a speed, so why should that speed be reduced to companies that refuse to pay a premium to ISPs. As for the proposed "fast lane" of letting the base speed stay constant but letting anyone pay for priority just makes the fast lane the new normal and removes competition for smaller startups who maybe can't afford to pay for this fast lane access. I will say once again the internet needs to be OPEN AND FREE. Please reclassify internet service providers as title two common carriers to keep it that way. Thank you.

Mr. Wheeler,

The "Paid Priority" plan is extremely flawed, and is dangerous to a massive source of innovation and economic growth in the United States. Internet providers provide a service that under any less outwardly corrupt administration would consider to be a Title II Common Carrier. Your proposal allows carriers to choose which traffic to provide "fast lanes" to, giving priority to existing and embedded companies and putting at a disadvantage small businesses and startups who need a common pipe to compete fairly. This gives too much power to the telecom industry to choose which internet companies fail and succeed.

We've already seen how some ISPs purposefully slow down legal content, such as Netflix and Torrents; because these technologies can compete with them, they have no qualms about abusing their position when possible. Your proposal is entirely to their benefit and against the benefit of the consumers you are supposed to protect.

Consider that the damage this will do to the United States - which is already *far behind* other countries because of telecom monopolies - will be on your name. You will be known in history as the corrupt FCC chairman who worked to destroy the internet in the name of short-term telecom profits.

There is an alternate future, where you are the one who enforced net neutrality and ushered in an age of economic prosperity and friendliness to small companies and startups.

Choose the correct choice for your conscience and your country.

Subject: The Internet Fast Lane, and Net Neutrality

Good afternoon, Commissioners.

I write to urge you to prevent telecommunications companies from creating an internet "fast lane," a plan which seems to keep coming back. I am sure none of you need an explanation, but if you are confused as to why we dislike this proposal, I invite you to watch the video here: <http://www.cgpgrey.com/blog/internet-citizens-defend-net-neutrality>

At least for my take, I need the internet for things like job searching and communicating with family and friends, but I also use it to update and maintain my blog, learn about the world at large, and sharpen my skills and knowledge. I also watch a lot of TV via Netflix and HBO, and stream my music from a Google account. I rely on the internet for a lot of things. I have a very limited budget, and a limited amount of time, I cannot really afford a fast lane to get any of these services--neither the necessary nor frivolous.

As for your work, I believe that you can do better. Not only for me, but for my colleagues and counterparts around the nation who have no doubt contacted you on this matter. I urge you to do what you can for the people of this country, and of the internet. I do not believe the telecom companies urging you for this have nefarious plans of censorship and global domination, but I am not convinced they will do the responsible thing with the power they could have.

The internet is a fine place as it stands, and I think it is in your power--and it is your responsibility as commissioners of the FCC--to maintain that.

I thank you for your time,
Grahame Turner,

Subject: Net Nuetrality Decision

To whom it may concern

I am writing to express my extreme disappointment in the decision made by the FCC regarding net neutrality and allow (by not blocking) ISPs the ability to prioritize bandwidth traffic based not on need, but the ability of the content provider to pay. I can find no compelling argument which would explain why the FCC would fail so fully in making this decision. I can only conclude that the FCC is not an agency of the people, but of the ISPs.

The majority of experts on this topic have agreed that allowing ISPs the ability to tier bandwidth based on ability to pay will stifle growth, innovation, and hurt small businesses and startups. Prior to making a final vote on this subject I hope that you will engage more with these experts and less with ISP lobbyists.

Thank you for your time.

To whom it may concern,

I have written to Mr Wheeler once before, I am extremely sure that a lot of people have done this. I cannot believe that you are selling us this double speak, and I cannot believe this rules, think about it as a road, you have toll roads to get to places faster, because other routes are slower; this is what is going to happen to the internet. Because of this rule, this will raise prices for the little guy and will show that you only care about lobbyist and not what the PEOPLE OF THE UNITED STATES have to say. This is deeply troubling, we all know that politicians are sold to super PACs, but this is outrageous, how can a little uprising content provider can compete with CNN or netflix or any large company, do you see it?? it's not fair, this is no different than allowing some companies to have 1 second of trading before anyone else, can you not see this!?.

Please, listen to the PEOPLE OF THE UNITED STATES, and stop listening to money, you may not care because you are rich, but the majority of the population are not. We need to keep the internet neutral, otherwise it will be like television and no little guy will have the opportunity to compete against large company behemoths, please don't ruin the internet.

Hi Chairman Wheeler,

I am writing to express my deep disappointment in your latest reforms announced today which could upend net neutrality by allowing 'pay-for-priority' agreements that undermine the Open Internet. I am further disappointed that as a Democrat, you chose to align with the big Internet Providers like AT&T and Verizon over the people and small entrepreneurs. Everyone, including yourself I believe, knows that the only solution to ensuring net neutrality is reclassifying ISPs as common carriers. It is a simple step and I am at a loss for words as to why the FCC seems so reticent to make this change. It would strongly strengthen the free internet and would follow in the footsteps of the European Union which just a few months back passed a similar proposal enshrining Net Neutrality. What we need is Net Neutrality not profit-based 'pay-for-priority' agreements. We need an open internet that encourages innovation and expression, not an internet tiered against the little guys and made for the large corporations. Please vote against your proposal and introduce new reforms that fix the flaws in the proposal you released today. 90% of Americans believe in Net Neutrality. If the FCC claims to support the Open Internet, then it needs to follow the 90% of Americans that find these fast lanes to be a fundamental threat to the internet as we know it.

Sincerely,

Subject: Internet Fast Lane

Good Afternoon,

A few weeks ago, I became aware of a net neutrality policy known as the Internet Fast Lane which in and of itself is an anti net neutrality policy. I find it very unsurprising that former telecom lobbyist and current chairman of the FCC Tom Wheeler is supporting and backing this policy. Anyone with the slightest amount of common sense can see that this is a very bad policy for net neutrality. The concept behind a free and open internet is to give everyone equal opportunity and access to the Internet. This new policy is completely the opposite. You want to "prioritize" certain Internet traffic over other traffic? Read: make companies and websites pay more for "prioritized" access? How is that fair? How is that equal opportunity? How can you even have the thought in your head that making companies pay to give faster access to it's customers over a free and open Internet is legal? We all know that the major telecom, media, and ISP companies are backing this deal; heck, they have Tom Wheeler in their back pocket and that is why he supports the deal. This policy is bad. Plain and simple. This is nothing more than padding the pockets of the telecoms and the media industry and to put wonderful Internet-based companies such as Netflix, Hulu, etc. out of business. Many people are outraged over this policy. But it probably doesn't matter much to you guys. It's just like everything else in the U.S. government. It doesn't matter what happens to the people. As long as the big companies get their way and the government officials that give the big companies their way are still in power, that will remain the status quo until someone is finally ready to do the right thing. Thank you for your time.

Sincerely,

Nate Owen

Subject: Public Comment: Open Internet & Net Neutrality
Hi FCC Commissioners and Staff,

Thank you for accepting public comments on the topic of Open Internet and Net Neutrality.

As a Librarian--an ambassador of knowledge and information, and advocate for ensuring my fellow citizens have open and equal access to knowledge--I feel strongly about ensuring an open Internet and net neutrality. As technology continually innovates and develops, the Digital Divide in our country grows, which in turn increases the divide in skills and access between the haves and the have-nots. This is disconcerting. We want everyone in our society to have equal access to information, knowledge, and resources. You never know where the best ideas and the greatest thinkers will come from, but without net neutrality, the voices of the have-nots and access to knowledge is stymied.

The Internet should be treated like a public utility to ensure free speech and equal access, to encourage entrepreneurialism and healthy market competition. Right now the ISPs, like Comcast, enjoy a monopoly and wield too much power. Comcast can decide at any time to limit free speech with the throttle of bandwidth and the flip of a switch. Please take action toward a net-neutral environment and treating the Internet and Internet access like a public utility.

Best Wishes,

Kate, the Librarian

I believe we should have rules in place that would not allow internet company's to trade money for better service. Internet company's should not be allowed to throttle certain traffic on the internet. If their infrastructure is unable to support all of the traffic, then they need to expand that structure. Internet speeds in the US are far behind many other countries. Not to mention other countries have more competitive prices. I would like to see plans in place to improve this infrastructure, not tethering and prioritizing traffic.

Subject: Net Neutrality
Hello Commissioner,

My name is Steve Gibbs and am a 26 year old resident of New York. My age group and those generations coming after us will be directly effected by the new FCC rules regarding the openness of the internet. Should the proposed rules go through the entire version of the internet as we know it will di. Over the next several years, powerful broadband providers will have the ability to directly control the speed and flow of information on the internet. They will slow down the internet as a whole in order to create these "fast lanes" for businesses able to pay for them. This not only creates an unfair marketplace to start ups but also will give this small group of companies essentially complete control (your proposed rules do nothing to protect net neutrality) over the flow of information. Should they not like a certain company or political message they will have the ability to censor them. They will control the internet marketplace and it will go from being a free market to one dominated by monopolistic tyranny. This is not opinion but fact. Other countries such as Brazil have already acted to prevent this which is why it boggles my mind that the US is lagging behind in a clear cut question of Free Speech and civilian right to equality. The internet has become a utility. How many times today have you used it? You probably have used it more than your phone which is already classified that way. It has become engrained into society (much like electricity or phone service) and allows people to access all of humanities knowledge. To restritict this in anyway is unacceptable, which is what cable broadband companies are trying. This is not an attack against corporations because tech giants are on the side of true net neutrality. I am a customer of Time Warner Cable and if you ask anyone they are terrible in almost every way when it comes to reliability. To give them this power and vote for political reasons is unforgivable.

Subject: Net Neutrality

Net Neutrality is an issue I have been following and engaging with for nearly a decade. Attempting to regulate internet speeds can be seen as a violation of free speech afforded to citizens. Web accessibility is already being impinged by search engine algorithms that favor popularity and, ultimately, encourage monopolies.

The original intent of early internet commerce adopters was to uphold a free space that placed all vendors on an even playing field. This should not be allowed to change because larger corporations can afford lobbyists who spend time spinning their wheels and chipping away at established internet framework.

Nothing is broken. Voting against Net Neutrality is a fiat solution. I urge you as a citizen concerned for my rights and those of other hard-working Americans who may not have the foresight to recognize the potential impact of this decision, please uphold Net Neutrality.

Hi Tom,

Please count me as another concerned citizen about the upcoming rules governing the internet. I believe that our government should be working to ensure that all traffic is treated equally so that all person can have access to all of the information on the internet. As I understand it, your proposal will allow telecoms to charge for a "fast lane" and that will lead to slower bandwidth for people who don't pay up. Please keep the internet open and free!

Subject: The internet needs to be regulated as a *public utility*...

If the current plans are put in place to allow ISPs the ability to cripple sites that they aren't "paid to offer access to", and the only sites are offered favoritism based on their ability to pay, it'll be the equivalent of denying equal access to free speech.

You *know* that ISPs like Comcast have a virtual monopoly over huge areas - if equal access isn't kept, then we're effectively giving them carte blanche to manipulate their customers data flow, effectively shaping what their customers can and cannot access. If I decided to offer a web-based service competing with another that is touting "fast-lane" access, how does that put me on equal footing? It clearly doesn't - it offers an advantage, but on a platform that has *always* been equal before now.

ISPs need to be regulated as a *public utility*. In this modern day, they are no different than the telcom providers of yesteryear, and if we don't get a handle on it now, it's going to do nothing but make the pseudo-monopolized ISPs (Comcast, Time Warner) just that more impervious to customers demands for change.

Please ask yourself - if you were an everyday, ordinary person, an *average* person here in the US - would this benefit you? Would this help you somehow? I, for one, have resigned from being manipulated by them - I outright refuse to use ANY of their services. While that means *incredibly* slow access for me via the ONLY other options, its the only move *I* have.

YOU can fix this. Please don't make the rest of us pay for this mistake.

Sincerely,

Dear FCC,

I am writing to express my outrage with Chairman Wheeler's new proposed rules to end net neutrality and sell 'fast lanes' on the internet to the highest bidder. Imagine the power company raising your rates for using the "wrong" vacuum cleaner. The water company reducing your running water because you don't use a "sponsored" garden hose. Whether you're selling a "tube" of electricity, water, or bandwidth, as common carriers they have no business extorting access to pad their profit margins.

To echo the letter sent to you by Senator Franken on April 29th, pay-to-play deals are an affront to net neutrality and have no place in an online marketplace that values competition and openness. Chairman Wheeler's new proposal would create an online 'fast lane' for the highest bidder - shutting out small businesses and increasing costs for consumers.

Furthermore, it is an affront to reason that the FCC would try to change the rules of the telecommunications industry in such a way as to give even more leverage to a select few companies that already have the American consumer in a stranglehold. Despite our wealth and technological sophistication, internet access in the United States lags far behind that of many other countries, including Latvia and the Czech Republic. Internet companies in the US are already selling substandard services at inflated prices. If you think that putting more power in their hands will somehow improve conditions for American internet users, then I have a bridge to sell you in Afghanistan.

To sum up, Chairman Wheeler's "Open Internet" NRMP will be about as good for internet access and competition as the Bush administration's "Clear Skies" Act of 2003 would have been for the environment. Net neutrality and common carrier status for internet service providers are issues that I care deeply about, and I hope you will do everything possible to protect a real open internet.

Justin Edwards

I just wanted to write to express my opposition to your current plan to allow internet "fast lanes." Allowing some providers to pay more for faster access inherently creates slower access for those who can't pay. What's more, the cost of this faster access will inevitably get passed on to the consumer. There should not be fast lanes for the highest bidders. The U.S.A. is being sold off, a new chunk every year. All who support the selling of fast lanes for the internet are greedy, as they probably got bribe money or will get a cut of the future pie. It is not in the best interest of the majority of American people, fast lanes will only benefit the corporations.

To Chairman Tom Wheeler and the FCC Commissioners—

FCC—

The 21st century internet is an integral part of our economy, democracy, and communication systems. America is absolutely dependent on an open internet operating on net neutrality principles.

As such, you have an obligation to regulate it as a utility. Please assert your Title II authority, and stop trying to appease the telecom giants at the expense of everyone else.

I (for one, and possibly hundreds of thousands more citizens) are seriously sick of having our needs undermined by special interests. The internet belongs to us, not to the big telecoms, etc. I regard it as an absolute right - part of free speech.

Net neutrality! Allowing yet another corporate takeover, this time stifling access to information and competition, is disgusting. Progress is made through competition. Proposals such as these are obviously a way for companies such as Comcast to continue to monopolize and stymie the competitive market. Passing this will basically tell start-ups to go to hell.

Hello,

To limit the accessibility of the internet is reducing the opportunity individuals have to change their quality of life. Many individuals use the internet for non-sense. However, many more individuals depend on it as their means of income, receiving current affairs, just to name a couple. Allow the masses the resources to become resourceful individuals, not ignorant surfs.

Net neutrality is very important. Internet providers are utilities and should be regulated as such. I have no more control about how they allow me access to sites than I do over how the gas company allows me access to gas for cooking. Don't take the possibly disastrous step of allowing internet providers to speed up, slow down, or block access some sites and not others. This would be extremely difficult to reverse!

Maintaining true internet neutrality is crucial to our democracy. It is the only sphere in which independent candidates can present themselves and it is the only sphere in which citizen groups can expose corporate abuses of power. Which is probably the real reason the corporations are trying to kill it. We must not allow corporate interests to control what information is available and what is not.

You must, if serving the public interest is the basis of your work, vote to uphold true, complete and transparent network neutrality. You should go further and make it law so we don't have to fight this battle every year or two!

Access to a internet not controlled by special interests ensures that we continue to have a level playing field for anyone to put out content, creativity, innovation and information. Our freedom is directly connected to our ability to access information and the internet has become the go to place for information.

The Internet was created and reached to be a method of communication for the people around the world. Giving some communications preferences over others means that what is actually going to happen will be an undemocratic process, same as with the dictatorship oppressing of speech and preventing the ideas in the speech into reaching the ones who are not rich. As you are here in the United States you have the duty to protect freedom and equality for all as you say this is a democratic country that supports equal opportunities.

Striation and stratification would essentially defeat the purpose of a free-flowing internet economy. It is the one place where people can go without discrimination of class; where people can represent themselves as equal to any other user.

Do you want to aid in building a digital caste system, or do you want to continue to protect a free digital, international forum? My prayer is that you are for the latter.

I just read the statements on your website, "What We Do" and I am very impressed with the power and responsibility you hold. You have the ability to empower "competition, innovation and investment in broadband services and facilities" here in the United States.

You have the power to "support the nation's economy by ensuring an appropriate competitive framework for the unfolding of the communications revolution" continues.

With "Net Neutrality" you are able to ensure diversity that makes our communities and our nation flourish.

Net neutrality will keep the internet a free market. It will ensure that those who are already underprivileged are not be systematically discriminated against on the internet as they already are in normal life.

If we do not ensure net neutrality then there will be a multitude of unintended consequences. Children from lower income backgrounds will be disadvantaged because their online homework assignments take longer. It will make small businesses, who may not be able to afford high speed connections, less competitive therefore stunting economic growth. The list can go on and it doesn't need to go on. Let's keep the net neutral.

Dear people at the FCC,

Please do everything in your power to keep the Internet as neutral and open to everyone as possible. This is one of the bulwarks of democracy today. In Europe, there is much faster Internet service for everyone. It would be a terrible shame that for us Americans large corporate entities like Comcast, AT&T and other telecom giants would start to restrict our access to the information network just for their own selfish game.

Internet has become a necessary communications need by everyone as with a Telephone, Broadband, and ISP Providers need to be classified as common carriers, even as it stands now, there are 19 million households that cannot afford Internet, the few large corporations who now own it also can manage content, decide what information you can get, block sites they don't like, allowing them to do this would be another nail in the coffin of our already eroding democracy.

Dear Commissioner,

The future of the open Internet is in your hands. And yet you have proposed rules that would actually break it.

Your proposed path would open the door to widespread discrimination online. It would give Internet service providers the green light to implement pay-for-priority schemes that would be a disaster for startups, nonprofits and everyday Internet users who cannot afford these unnecessary tolls.

I urge you to scrap these proposed rules and instead restore the principle of online nondiscrimination by reclassifying broadband as a telecommunications service.

Thanks,

Tim Keough

Dear FCC,
Please do not bow to corporate demands for the right to buy Internet throttle settings!

The Internet must remain a place where non-commercial entities (education, government, non-profit orgs, private citizens) can communicate with speed equal to that of corporations over the same networks (that is, no "throttling").

If you allow corporations to purchasing higher throttle settings for money, you will have essentially turned The Internet into just yet another one-way geyser of corporate advertising and propaganda. The corporations already have one such geyser: commercial television. Don't give them The Internet as well! The Internet is for actual communications. If the corporations want to advertise, tell them to go do it on TV, not HERE.

I believe in fair competition but not monopoly of the major telecom companies such as AT&T, Comcast, and others. The proposal that you are about to undertake will undermine small telecom companies the opportunity to compete and provide service to individuals who can't afford to pay these big telecom companies. We all should have access to the Internet at a reasonable and affordable price. I ask that you vote against this proposal.

A "plutarchy" is a coined combination of an oligarchy of plutocrats. Welcome to the United States of America, Inc. Pay-to-play has made me an object, a possession to be controlled and manipulated in virtually every aspect of my life. More specific, my cable bill has gone from $124 to $224 with ZERO changes in service and they're in control. Do not allow fast lanes for those who have the money to afford pay-to play. Make net neutrality really neutral.

Please put an end to further media consolidation in the US by rejecting the idea of pay to play on the Internet with preferential treatment of large content providers. The internet needs to not discriminate by content or type of information and in many areas internet providers are a monopoly concern. Like utility monopolies and wired telecom, internet providers need to have common carrier status with no preferential treatment of content.

Thank you

You would ruin the NET permanently for the masses if you choose to let big money and even little companies suck up control of traffic on the NET.

You've already LOST INCOME from me, because I did without before, and I am doing without again (stopped spending), by using public net only....the communications companies and software sifters like Yelp and Yext and domain name buyers are smaller parasites, but are playing the same game as BIG communications, the TAPEWORMS of the system (who, like middle-man insurance companies to the medical profession- in turn pander to BIG PHARMA)...until the system has become so degraded in quality and fairness that those IN THE KNOW avoid it, at all costs.

You bite your nose to spite your face if you let this continue. Someone's going to create an alternate system and this one will have lost billions in attrition.

Contain the parasites. Snooze, you loose.

Subject: Keep the internet open
Hello,

My name is Ian Brittain and I am writing you not as a concerned consumer, but as a citizen of the United States of America. A nation where the opinion of the people is supposed to be held in high regard and acted upon, so please take what I'm about to ask seriously.

I ask you to please classify broadband companies, like Comcast and Verizon, as Title 2 common carriers. In order to maintain net neutrality, it is vital to regulate companies who would provide these so called "fast lanes" and prevent them from doing so. Allowing these companies to limit who is allowed to have "fast access" will stifle innovation of individuals and small businesses.

Comcast has been rated as having terrible customer service for years. If they are concerned about regulations being bad business for them, perhaps they should try to improve on their system of poor service, instead of trying to leverage this situation to allow them to squeeze more money out of entrapped consumers. We are trapped because their predatory business model, buying out Time Warner etc., stifles competition from other providers.

Keep the internet open. Net neutrality is vital to the world and is the last bastion of true equality. Do not be the nails that close shut the coffin of this equality.

Thank you,

Ian Brittain

Net Neutrality is an important issue of our time. It relates to potential corporate censorship of information for the sake of profit, (further) undermining the people's ability to access untainted information to allow them to decide for themselves. As we have heard before, an informed citizenry is the keystone to a working democracy.

Any idiot should be able to see that this proposal would be bad for the consumer. And this is before considering the harm that could be done by special interests.

The first goal of any elected individual should be to protect our rights, whether they themselves agree with our decisions or not. This includes our right to free speech. Gentlemen, prove yourselves worthy of our respect.

Dear FCC,

If you do not rescind today's action by classifying the internet as a utility, you will have destroyed the most valuable communication device yet created.

Do not yield to the giant communications corporations. They care nothing about the internet as a social benefit--only as a means of profit. And they will destroy it for that reason alone.

Don't be a part of that destruction. Please.

Dear Commissioner,

The future of innovation is in your hands. And yet you have proposed rules that would actually break it.

Current path would keep so many young companies from prospering. It would give Internet service providers the green light to implement pay-for-priority schemes that would be a disaster for startups, nonprofits and everyday Internet users who cannot afford these unnecessary tolls.

I urge you to scrap these proposed rules and instead restore the principle of online nondiscrimination by reclassifying broadband as a telecommunications service.

I am severely disappointed in you, but optimistic you will do what is right for our society.

To whom it may concern:

I strongly urge you to defend and uphold net neutrality. A free and open Internet is integral to communication, free speech, business and technological innovation, and so on.

Allowing telecoms to decide who gets access to the best speeds may sound like a good, sensible idea, but it could have disastrous ramifications.

If nothing else, it should be telling that many top tech companies -- Google, Netflix, Yahoo, Facebook, Microsoft -- consider the loss of net neutrality to be "a grave threat to the Internet."

Net Neutrality is critical for an open internet! PLEASE do not destroy the internet for Americans by allowing big corporations to control what speed users can access content! Net Neutrality is also necessary for the survival of small businesses and non-profits who would not be able to afford the "tolls" that ISPs want to charge.

Furthermore, most people have NO CHOICE when it comes which ISP to use for broadband internet access -- the ISPs have monopolies in various regions. So consumers are stuck with their ISP even if they are furious that the ISP is slowing down or blocking content - they have no one else to switch to!

If you have a fast lane that is more profitable for the carriers (and face it, why else have a fast lane?), then that will tend to freeze the slow lane where it is today... which is already far behind the rest of the connected world. And then where will the slow lane be in 5 years? It will not have moved, so the new and innovative uses of the internet in 5 years will find the slow lane unusable. At the same time the cost of accessing the fast lane will be beyond the entrepreneurs. This will stifle innovation and tilt the field to the big money already in the field.

Don't take our right to a free and open internet for the world away from us. Let's try to focus on the improvement of life on this planet instead of its detriment which will result as all people's ability to communicate with each other diminishes through a less open internet.

The Internet should remain neutral to all businesses and consumers. Allowing companies to charge for providing faster lanes for some but not the others will result in stifling competition, especially for small businesses. It's wrong, please DO NOT do it!

Subject: New Rules
Dear Chairman Wheeler,

Recently the FCC has made a move to limit the freedom of communication in this country, I find this appalling. In the words of Winston Churchill "There is nothing wrong with change, if it is in the right direction." This is certainly not the right direction. These new rules will single handily deliver the internet into the hands of the 26 most powerful ISPS. This is not a way to foster competition, which is the foundation of an advancing and growing economy. I you to reconsider these rules and instead provide strong net neutrality rules that would foster competition over the internet, instead of squelch it.

Best Regards,

I am a Lansing resident (zip code 48906). I was hoping to let the chairman know that myself and my colleagues are vehemently opposed to the FCCs plans to allow ISPs to create internet "fast lanes". These "fast lanes" will only afford them the ability to slow down websites that do not tow the company line, and the very concept is completely ignorant. Please let the chairman know that I rise in support of reclassification of internet service providers under Title 2 entities.

Simply put: allowing ISPs to throttle service is a move against the proliferation of knowledge.

Thank you.

Dear Chairman Wheeler, and Commissioners Clyburn, Rosenworcel, Pai, and Rielly,

The future of the open Internet is in your hands. And yet you have proposed rules that would actually break it.

Your proposed path would open the door to widespread discrimination online. It would give Internet service providers the green light to implement pay-for-priority schemes that would be a disaster for startups, nonprofits and everyday Internet users who cannot afford these unnecessary tolls.

I urge you to scrap these proposed rules and instead restore the principle of online nondiscrimination by reclassifying broadband as a telecommunications service.

Please do not move forward with the proposal that would allow Comcast, AT&T and other big telecom companies to decide who can benefit from fast Internet speed -- while slowing down, or even blocking, everyone else -- and making millions in profit from it!

This limitation of access to the internet would have negative consequences on freedom of speech, industrial and academic research, emerging companies, and every internet user.

Please build any net neutrality argument upon solid legal standing. Specifically, this means reclassifying broadband under Title II of the Telecommunications Act of 1934.

706 authority from the Telecommunications Act has been repeatedly struck down in court after legal challenges by telecom companies. Take the appropriate steps to prevent this from happening again.

No "fast lanes" on the internet. Period.

You current proposal is backwards: It grants general permission for ISPs to throttle the internet in any way they feel profits them -- without any regard for the public good. Although you leave open the government ability to step in a stop bad deals, you know this is a red herring offered disingenuously since the do-nothing nature of Washington will continue to allow large corporations free reign. Later everyone figures that you will take a high-paying job with one of those corporations as a reward for serving their interests at the public's expense.

Here's another idea that could save your name: Make rules that maintain a free and open internet and allow the FCC to make EXCEPTIONS on a case-by-case basis. That way you can put your name on all of the exceptions you grant and maintain your integrity so that people will not be able to say that you sold-out the public to powerful corporations for your own self-interest.

This is just another scam to rob the average American Joe of his freedoms and to suck non-existent money out of his ever shrinking pocket. How much are you going to suck out before we're all nothing but indentured Slaves to a corporation? Let's all march Fascism into this country one money sucking law after another. The internet is the poor man's library...

Don't turn the internet into another tool that only the super rich can afford.

PLEASE DO NOT ALLOW Comcast, AT&T or other big telecom companies to decide who can benefit from fast Internet speed -- while slowing down, or even blocking, everyone else -- and making millions in profit from it!

Without Net Neutrality, ISPs like AT&T, Comcast, Time Warner Cable and Verizon will be able to block content and speech they don't like, reject apps that compete with their own offerings, and prioritize Web traffic (reserving the fastest loading speeds for the highest bidders and sticking everyone else with the slowest).

In our Democratic country, it's imperative that free and unblocked internet communication be allowed to continue unabated!

We the people, ordinary citizens, demand the right of freedom of speech through electronic communication and research, which we've earned by buying the tools to use it.

We may not be rolling in dough, but that doesn't mean companies or government entities have the right to take our freedom of communication away from us!

There is no reason why the people who has loads of money should have a different type of Internet than the rest of the world. The Internet as we presently have it---free and equal to all---has changed the world significantly and quite positively. Giving the wealthy people another benefit to the detriment of those not so fortunate monetarily by slowing the Internet for most of us is wrong and should not be permitted. Not everything is business and should be allowed solely for the wealthy. Please keep the Internet as it has been from the beginning of its existence---free and equal to all users.

Do NOT allow broadband service providers the ability to segregate traffic based on speed. Even if the telecoms are not allowed to slow anyone down, it will STIFLE the ability for upstart technology companies to innovate in a space dominated by those with deeper pockets. If this is allowed to happen, the consequences will be catastrophic for the American technology sector. Pursue the will of the AMERICAN PUBLIC and not WEALTHY CORPORATE INTERESTS. FCC Commissioners,

I was shocked to see in the news today that you have decided to go forward with your proposal to allow internet "fast lanes" despite the outcry of the general public. If implemented, this proposal will destroy the internet as we know it. You cannot expect to foster a free market if you are allowing those with money better access. This will harm all but a select few internet based companies, and will discourage investment and entrepreneurship. As the FCC, your role is to protect consumers, and this is clearly not what the consumers want. I know that numerous internet giants have already spoken out against this proposal (Google, Yahoo, Netflix, Ebay, etc) and that thousands of citizens have contacted you in an attempt to do the same.

Please, please, please put a stop to this. We do not want these internet "fast lanes". It is my belief that ISPs should be reclassified as public utility providers. This is the only way to truly protect the free and open internet. What you are proposing will do the opposite. You are not there to help ISP providers such as Comcast and AT&T. LISTEN to the people you are supposed to be protecting. Put an end to this! WE DO NOT WANT THIS!

Sincerely,

William Luce

Hello,

I'm writing to urge you to keep the Internet open! One of the major bright spots in the economy today is small internet companies that are making our lives better by pursuing small niches. These companies are small, they challenge the internet giants to constantly better their products, allowing us the consumer and I think we could say mankind in general benefits. In short they create competition. If as is proposed that companies of means (mostly internet giants) could pay their content into the fast lanes of the internet surely innovation and competition would be crippled. This is why we need to keep an open internet.

I urge you to keep the internet open!

Chairman Tom Wheeler

Dear Chairman Wheeler,

As an Illinois consumer who depends on a fast, affordable web connection, I am concerned that a free and open Internet is now in grave danger.

Dear Mr. Tom Wheeler,

Daily life and functioning in today's world rely on the current system for Internet access. We are troubled by reports that the Federal Communications Commission (FCC) plans to propose new rules that would open the door for big Internet providers to offer a "fast lane" to the highest bidders. These plans are unfair to the consumer and everyday citizen who rely on the internet to power everyday actions.

Please, stand up for consumers, protect net neutrality, and fight for the free and open Internet.

Sincerely,

Ms. Adrianna M. Sakolari
6443 N Bosworth Ave. Apt 3
Chicago, IL 60626

That violates the spirit of "net neutrality."

Please, stand up for consumers, protect net neutrality, and fight for the free and open Internet.

Sincerely,

Ms. Adrianna Sakolari

I'm an internet business owner and have built the American Dream and helped others do the same because of the internet. What are we coming to as a society if we can't use a vehicle that is open to build our dreams with a little hardwork. Please don't let the future be controlled for the few. America has always been built on hardwork and freedom to dream. Don't let that away so we as a country fall further behind in the world. We are supposed to set the world standard but now we must follow suit with Brazil and the EU. Are we willing to silence the next Google, Amazon or Facebook so corporations have more money unfairly?

Passing this measure is a huge mistake. It is in violation of our freedom of speech and freedom of the press. Big corporations have to be stopped and let it be known that they are not too big to be dealt with. Monopolies are not welcome here in the US.

I am very concerned about the possibility that a few corporations could control the internet because of the opportunity they would have to stifle free speech and political dissent. We live in a time when corporations and wealthy individuals are literally trying end our "noble experiment" in democracy and replace it with an oligarchy. Equal speed in internet communication is essential to healthy political and social debate.

I believe that the internet has reached the point where it is an essential service and should be regulated as a public utility just as we regulate telecommunications. This would allow a fair and secure rate of return to investors while protecting our constitutional rights to free speech.

Dear Commissioner,

Your recent proposals and statements to end Net Neutrality are of great concern to me. I believe that allowing ISPs to create fast-lanes for their preferred customers will be the end of a free and open internet. In reality these "fast-lanes" will be a misnomer and the only new aspect the companies will create are "slow-lanes" for their competition. As such, consumers like myself will be forced to pay more for less because they operate without true competition in their regions.

Please remember that your duty is to the people of this great country. Your actions will either protect the greatest exchange of ideas that has ever existed, or it will be its undoing.

To Whom it May Concern:

Net Neutrality is such an important issue as access to technology and the Internet continues to increase. Allowing large telecommunications companies to throttle Internet speed based on any factor, such as specific website or traffic type, sets a truly frightening precedent. The United States, along with many other nations, condemns the efforts of nations such as China to block access to Internet content deemed inappropriate by the government. If telecom companies are allowed to control Internet traffic under the guise of financial need, the door is opened for these companies to slow down or block access to content they do not approve, while using financial concerns as an excuse.

The Internet has revolutionized the ability of individuals and groups from around the world to communicate, collaborate, and in some cases expose terrible acts that may not have been otherwise reported. Any threat to the free and open nature of the Internet threatens the great benefit that the Internet has brought to the world.

Dear Commissioner,

The future of the open Internet is in your hands. And yet you have proposed rules that would actually break it. Your proposed path would open the door to widespread discrimination online. It would give Internet service providers the green light to implement pay-for-priority schemes that would be a disaster for startups, nonprofits and everyday Internet users who cannot afford these unnecessary tolls.

I urge you to scrap these proposed rules and instead restore the principle of online nondiscrimination by reclassifying broadband as a telecommunications service.

Companies already have far more than enough power in this country. An Internet that favors no group over another is one of the few things left to the actual citizens of this country. These companies have already shown that they don't care about their customers, only their profits. They can't be trusted to NOT abuse any power given them, so don't give them anymore.

Net neutrality is the reason why the internet has been such a driver of commerce in this country - there's no way to stifle competition. That's what allows startups to become companies like Google - anyone can choose where they want to go.

If the internet providers can pick and choose, the loser in the short term will always be the startup without any money, and the loser in the long term will be everyone.

The internet has always been a driver of innovation - please support net neutrality and keep it that way.

Our nation was built upon the freedom of speech. The Internet is the new medium for voices to be heard, and net neutrality is what allows our country to and the world to keep these voices from being smothered by the wealthy. It's a place unlike the TV media, where there is a vast diversity of opinions that keep our people educated. Net neutrality is essential to maintain open communication, please protect it.

This is worrying that we as a country of the first world, one of the leaders in innovation, leaders in trying to spread equality in all aspects of life around the world, are slaves to corporate take overs of our day to day lives in our own backyard. Shouldn't we as a leading country do everything possible to give equal opportunity for everyone to thrive and expand their skills, knowledge and wisdom in general? The availability of fast and reliable internet to the general population, without any financial pressure, will only improve the technological caliber of our own kids and future generation? Have we become so blind in the process of making money that we have lost the sense of our own community's good? In my humble opinion, this bill is preposterous.

Dear Commissioner,

The future of the open Internet is in your hands. And yet you have proposed rules that would actually break it.

Your proposed path would open the door to widespread discrimination online. It would give Internet service providers the green light to implement pay-for-priority schemes that would be a disaster for startups, nonprofits and everyday Internet users who cannot afford these unnecessary tolls.

I urge you to scrap these proposed rules and instead restore the principle of online nondiscrimination by reclassifying broadband as a telecommunications service.

Please uphold net neutrality. Allowing internet service providers to charge different rates for services with higher bandwidth is tantamount to capping internet bandwidth for users.

This has serious repercussions for internet growth and freedom of information.

I rely often on the internet for information so I will be more informed & educated, to research products & prices, to better manage my daily life. This information seldom comes from mega-corporations but far more often from small business, non-profit organizations funded mainly by donations & blogs about a wide variety of subjects.

Please do not limit the usefulness of the internet by making it more difficult to find & use sources that make it easier for me to keep up with our rapidly changing world. The best information does not always come from the financially richest sources.

Do not allow the entire globe to be dictated to or limited, just so already wealthy, monopolistic entities can have more control and money.

Subject: The future of the open internet
Dear sir,

The internet is one of the biggest innovations Americans have made in years. It has created new jobs, nay entire new industries, connected people the world over, and completely changed how the world works.

Today you have voted to take this innovation and cripple it for reasons I cannot fathom.

The internet has no need of a 'fast lane'. By forcing companies to pay for faster speeds online you are killing the future of non-profit websites, internet startups, and other potential sources of American jobs and businesses.

I am speaking to you as a student of Information Technology. Upon my graduation I was hoping to go into the IT field and make a career for myself. Today you took the field I am going into and kneecapped it. You are hurting American jobs and the future of American innovation as we know it.

I am writing you to demand that you reverse your decision and that you reclassify American ISPs as Type II Common Carriers. You are selling out my future sir, and I do not approve.

Yours most sincerely,
Stephen Nagy

The internet is being used in a much different capacity than when it was designated title I almost two full decades ago. Internet communication is critical to education and business the same way telephone communication is and has been in the past. Internet providers should be designated "common carriers" to ensure that they serve public interest and cannot discriminate. Please ensure that the public's best interests are the focus of internet legislation.

It is outrageous to see the blatant manipulation of our Constitutional freedoms to benefit the greed of corporations trying to take over the internet for their profit.

Do we have any left in positions of power who have the moral sense of right and wrong to stop the erosion of personal freedoms against major corporations tamping them?

Will it be you?

Or will you take the payback we all know will be forthcoming.

Please build any net neutrality argument upon solid legal standing. Specifically, this means reclassifying broadband under Title II of the Telecommunications Act of 1934.

Through selectively allowing access on basis of god knows what is nefarious and unethical. Tim Berners-Lee invented http, which allowed us all to surf the Internet, and offered it free of charge. Corporations have relied on this free standard to make literally trillions using Berners-Lee's free standard. Now greedy ISP's want to set up toll gates for that which they don't own. The intention of those who built the Internet was that it remain free and open. The Internet has become a vital service, a public utility, and must remain as such.

Allowing internet service providers to create internet "fast lanes" and "slow lanes" would do nothing more than allow them to extort payments from companies like Netflix. It's time to admit that the internet is a public utility, not a private "service."

Subject: Net Neutrality

If you've been alive in a first world country since the 90's it should be obvious to you what the benefits are of a free, open, and neutral internet. This is the style of internet governance that has made the United States the undisputed world leader of internet technology. People from all over the world flock to the United States to start the next Google or Twitter not because of our economic and social programs for small business development but because the culture of a free and open internet and the opportunities provided by it, are stronger here than anywhere else in the world. The plan of allowing ISP "fast lanes" for rich, well established firms is a precedent that will finally destroy that culture. When established firms are able to provide faster, more reliable services to customers than what start ups can possibly afford, the focus will be on which service can afford to give customers the fastest access. When that happens the meeting of ideas that has characterized the rapid advancement of internet services will conclude and waiting in its place is the same technological stagnation and customer dissatisfaction that telecoms have provided since their inception. No longer will it be possible for a new Netflix to beat the cable company's movies on demand service in quality and price. No longer will it be possible for a new Facebook or Twitter to defeat a Myspace. It is genuinely astonishing that anyone could believe this will improve anything but the ISP profit margins and those whom can afford to muscle out the smaller competition. It has been more than a decade since internet service became a utility all Americans need to use to conduct the business of their daily lives. It is well past time to recognize the common carrier status of internet traffic. The 'fast-lane' idea is blatantly anti-consumer and it is the FCC's duty to keep the internet free, open, and neutral for all Americans.

Thank You,

Ryan J. Coleman

The internet should be for everyone of every race, greed, color, or financial income. It is our freedom of speech!!!!
The government does not have the right to take this from us or select who and who not can have it.

Subject: Sell out

Mr Wheeler would do well to remember that he serves the people and not the ISP's. The Selling out of the peoples internet to third partied interlopers is a dereliction of duty on the part of Mr Wheeler who has shown a lack of testicular fortitude to perform his duties as the peoples intermediary to third partied ISPs. The internet was started with government block grants to NASA back in the 1950s-1960s and was further improved through out the years. Meaning that the internet belongs to we the people. We have allowed third parties to interject themselves into it for maintenance and improvements but its foundation belongs to the people. Now these third parties interlopers have a feeling of entitlement to ownership of the internet that never was theirs to begin with. Your job and those around you Mr Wheeler is to keep things like this from happening and as of this point in time you have proven yourself to be inept an epic failure. The task at hand of over site of the peoples investment in this critical piece of infrastructure is quite simple via reclassification and yet, you it seems are incapable of such a simple task. Perhaps you should remove yourself from this position and allow someone with more expertise in over site of the peoples monied interests as you seem to be in over your head in this current battle with self entitled multi national parasites.

The internet is, for all practical purposes, a public utility at this point. Allowing corporations the the wealthy to control internet access will stifle America's innovation, ability to compete internationally, and will violate the free speech of anyone who is not wealthy enough to pay for the privilege of sharing their thoughts and ideas. If you really care about our country and the rights of our citizens, I hope you will vote appropriately.

I would like to see all Americans become a part of building the future of the internet. Many human beings on our planet have come to rely on the World Wide Web as a way to connect to one another in a world where one small action on one side of the earth effects the life of one on the other side of the earth. We all need to have equal, unrestricted access to the internet to properly, and peacefully interact. This is more than an issue of free speech, it's an issue of human co-creation in uncertain times. This is a time to work together to share resources and to hear all voices when many are being oppressed.

Subject: The future of the Internet depends on Net Neutrality
Commissioners,

As a Software Engineer I can say with confidence that the future of the Internet depends on Net Neutrality, without of which ONLY the ISP's benefit.

As consumers we already use services like Netflix at speeds below what we were promised when we signed up for Internet service. We get by though, because the freedom for all services to use the same Internet is more important to society and our future than how long it takes for a cartoon to load on my television.

The Internet has been one of the most successful and influential inventions to our modern society and world. If we reflect on what the Internet is and how it's come to be, we would see that the Internet's inherent fairness is the glue holding the web together.

The Internet has created a generation of people that will fight for the philosophy it currently abides by. Freedom and fairness for the consumption of information on the Internet is a driving force behind the greatest minds of the information age.

I can assure you that getting rid of Net Neutrality will lead to a future where the Internet as we know and love will cease to exist. However, never underestimate the brilliance of the programmers and engineers on the Internet. If YOU break the Internet, there will be another. Let's skip that for now and keep Net Neutrality.

Thank you for your time.

The Paid Priority plan is dangerous to innovation on the internet and should be struck down. Additionally, the FCC should take steps to reclassify internet service providers as Title II Common Carriers to ensure that innovation cannot be stifled further.

The telecom companies are put at an advantage by not providing the same level of service to companies that compete with them. The Internet is a sufficiently important piece of infrastructure to our economy that allowing a small monopoly of companies to choose who succeeds will ultimately slow economic growth and innovation, and continue our path of declination as a world leader in technology.

Dear Commissioner,

The FCC should take the necessary steps to ensure that the internet remains an open platform for speech and commerce so that America continues to lead the world in technology markets. The future of the open Internet is in your hands. And yet you have proposed rules that would actually break it. I'm writing to demand that the FCC reclassify American ISP's as Title II common carriers. Such rules are essential for the future of the Internet.

Your proposed path would open the door to widespread discrimination online. It would give Internet service providers the green light to implement pay-for-priority schemes that would be a disaster for start-ups, nonprofits and everyday Internet users who cannot afford these unnecessary tolls.

I urge you to scrap these proposed rules and instead restore the principle of online nondiscrimination by reclassifying broadband as a telecommunications service.

Sincerely,

Please consider the lack of a Fairness Doctrine and conglomeration of media in this country and do not change things to worsen this situation. Too much money getting all the access, which is how i see this issue. We have been cutting our cable bills and turning to the internet streamers because we have lower cost and more choice over content. How about these companies fixing the real problem, instead of just propping up their bottom lines with more cash and forcing the competition out? Is that the American Way? The Government agencies are to ensure we still play fair. I support Sen Warren's proposal. Will you please listen? Thank you.

Dear FCC,

I believe that net neutrality will determine whether the United States flourishes as a nation. Without net neutrality it will make life so much more difficult for anything new to happen on the internet, inhibiting the spread of new ideas and innovation for the future. I have been following this issue and I see no reason why this proposal to "kill the internet", as they say, should be allowed. It is only to benefit large corporations by making them large amounts of money while inhibiting the free world of the internet. I live way out in Montana and i rely on the internet to do so many things for me. The fact that I can find and learn almost anything on the internet from the middle of no where has helped me develop myself as an individual and helps me support myself and develop new ideas for my company and gain new skills so that I am a valuable employee. If the United States were to go down this route all innovation would slow down in droves. It would be hard to get anything done and create new ideas. It is my belief that if this were to happen the companies would drain the money from american taxpayers, then go to countries like Asia where they have open internet and more innovation and hire everybody from there. In no way at all do I support this proposal.

Subject: The internet isn't a private service

To Chairman Tom Wheeler and the FCC Commissioners——

The modern economy would collapse without the internet and American life would be extraordinarily disrupted. It's a simple fact that the internet is a public utility, not a private service. It's time we regulated it as such. For much too long, public utilities such as radio, television, and electric power, have been usurped by private industries. The internet is vital to modern life, and should be free and open to ALL people, regardless of their ability to pay or their social status.

Please keep the Internet free and net neutrality the law of the land. Regulate the Internet as the public utility that it is!
Thank you.

For all the other enterprising Americans like me, if our sites are slowed down unless we pay more to the already rich, I can think of nothing worse to undermine free enterprise, and our whole economy. If those of us who can afford it least must pay extra so large corporations can put every last penny in their bulging pockets by denying our right to do business on an equal footing, this is a blatant form of discrimination. I support Net Neutrality, and think it ought to be proposed and passed as a law that can never be undone!

I understand the fact that the FCC needs to look into issues involving Internet providers and the respective servers they carry onto consumers. My only hope is that when you look into this matter you consider that one of the most beautifully constructed places of freedom we have left in the world is the Internet. The idea that anyone can post nearly anything on the Internet is amazing and it allows us to have a open outlet for our views. If Internet providers are able to shut down certain sites or charge more to visit those sites we stand in a dangerous place that could potentially negatively impact our freedom to voice our ideas and concerns if they do not align with the mainstream ideas. It also informs people that we care more about their wallets and financial assets than their ideas.

Thank you for your time and consideration in this matter.

We will not let corporate takeover the internet. All of this is so unnecessary and comes from nothing but evil and manipulation. I hate it.

To Those Who Are Voting:

PLEASE turn down this proposal! We have Big Money and Dark Money hip-deep in our political system already, don't let it happen in the freest form of communication we have currently.

For those who take their chances and lose? They knew that going in. To those who win? They tend to have an appreciation for the success, knowing that they could've failed- some having found success a second or third time.

The world is growing ever closer and becoming culturally richer for it. To have Big Money arbitrarily decide someone's importance/ worth/usefulness is the *opposite* of what the Internet was meant to do! It is insulting to those of us who have already been told what tv channels are "important", whether we want or watch those channels.

I have started reconnecting to relatives with which I have lost touch. If I have to pay more folks (and probably more money) to do so, I will return to snail mail.

I play Facebook games. I will delete my account and the three companies with games I like will lose my money.

The folks on a chat site, who I enjoy their dialogue and debate and snark, will not have me to snark on and with because I refuse to pay insane prices/pay into a system that disrupts a working system.

That this proposal has made it this far, shows it for the cash grab by the already powerful minority that it is.

Again, I urge you to reject *ANY* proposal that wants to do what this proposal wants. PROTECT Net Neutrality! TYA (Thank You in Advance)

Dear FCC,

The future of the open Internet is in your hands. And yet you have proposed rules that would actually break it. Your proposed path would open the door to widespread discrimination online. It would give Internet service providers the green light to implement pay-for-priority schemes that would be a disaster for start-ups, nonprofits and everyday Internet users who cannot afford these unnecessary tolls. I urge you to scrap these proposed rules and instead restore the principle of online nondiscrimination by reclassifying broadband as a telecommunications service.

The Internet must stay free and open. Massive telecommunications companies, such as Comcast and AT&T, should not now, or ever, have the authority to regulate who benefits from fast Internet speed and who does not. Every individual should be able to benefit from accessible, high-speed Internet; such a thing should be construed as part of the public domain and not manipulated by massive corporations for a profit that benefits the few at the expense of the many.

Hey! Remember "we the people"? This proposal is counter to the interests of the average citizen of the USA. It benefits the rich, who need no further help, and is the enemy of the free flow of information and a healthy society. Don't do it!

Any and all limitations on Internet traffic open up to many loopholes that can harm innovation.

Government, corporations or other entities are not there to decide what is an what is not important on the Internet. As with any technological advance the Internet has been and will be used for ill purposes and commercial gain. We can not allow commercial organizations to decide what is right and wrong though.

At the heart of it the Internet is an exchange of ideas. Keeping the Internet free and open is the only way to cultivate new ideas and allow for a more global community.

The internet should not be allowed to be hijacked by large corporations. The large corporations do not need federal support of any sort to further business models. By allowing corporations to manipulate infrastructure models around speed will create a class system on the net and a monopoly that we will live to regret. Don't allow it to happen. Keep it classified as an essential right for all people to have access.

The consolidation of internet service is degrading performance and reducing competition by partitioning the market into what are effectively regional monopolies.

Rather than make it easier for ISPs to wall off their systems from competition and control the flow of content, the internet should be treated as a utility where the overall performance of the system is the primary mandate.

The United States should have the BEST internet speeds in the world and yet we lag behind nearly every developed nation. This stifles innovation and kills jobs.

Net Neutrality MUST be maintained.

Dear Commissioner Wheeler,

The future of the open Internet is in your hands. And yet you have proposed rules that would actually break it.

Your proposed path would open the door to widespread discrimination online. It would give Internet service providers the green light to implement pay-for-priority schemes that would be a disaster for startups, nonprofits and everyday Internet users who cannot afford these unnecessary tolls.

I urge you to scrap these proposed rules and instead restore the principle of online nondiscrimination by reclassifying broadband as a telecommunications service.

Dear Sirs,

You are about to vote on one of the most important bills in the history of the internet. Please consider carefully what that will mean for all the people on the globe and try to look past present time and ask yourself, how will this decision shape the future of information flow.

Free and unrestricted information flow is essential for our country, and us as people. This is how we share ideas, report offenders, advertise our handicrafts and our small businesses...talk about things that matter to us that we want the world to know about...I could go on and on about the benefits of non-tiered information sharing.

If you go down the path of giving our communication companies a way to suppress/slow down or completely block information from regular people or even smaller businesses that can't afford priority service, what you will be effectively doing is taking away our right to choose and give us just a perception of choice. All these big companies already advertise their products through regular means like TV/Radio/Internet ads, and people are free to choose to listen to/watch them or not.

However if you give priority to big companies and their services, they will effectively gain unfair advantage over everyone else. What is most likely going to end up happening is that these big companies will just stay big even if their service is horrible and none of the smaller companies will be able to grow since their service/advertisements are suppressed/blocked/slowed down due to this potential wrong decision.

People's perception of fast and slow internet content changed significantly in the last 10 years and new generations of kids will not have patience for slow content even if it's better.

We live in the society where speed matters significantly, we sleep less and work more, we need things accomplished fast, and this is not going to change.

We have to look past our selves and think about young and new generations and importance of fair choice we can continue giving them by voting against tiered internet. Internet content discrimination is just as bad as any other form of discrimination and should not be added to the list of problems that future generations need to deal with.

You have a chance to be a voice of reason and vote against tiered internet.

Make the right choice.

With respect,

Subject: dont destroy net-neutrality!

We already have enough of a government that is "of the corporations, by the corporations, and for the corporations". A recent Princeton University study concluded that the USA is technically no longer a Democracy, but is in actuality more of an Oligarchy. To change the rules of the internet to allow any entity to purchase faster access, would be another step down the path that is corrupting and destroying our system of government and society. Those who are not rich are having their rights drowned in a vast sea of money, by those who are.

A nation that makes a great distinction between its scholars and its warriors will have its thinking done by cowards and its fighting done by fools. -Thucydides of Sparta

It is vitally important to the growth of our society for new ideas, open discussions and small business to have an equal platform with which to reach their audience.

If you let the telcom companies charge for access that will disappear.

If they really need money to build infrastructure then they'll find it in other ways. This isn't necessary. Please don't move forward with this proposal.

Subject: Open Internet/Net Neutrality

Today's ruling was a travesty. The argument put forward by the very companies that stand to make billions from this ruling is both comical and chilling at the same time. With CEOs of broadband Internet companies Verizon, Randall AT&T, Time Warner Cable and Comcast – warning that reclassifying broadband into a Title II public utility would threaten new investment in broadband infrastructure and jeopardize the spread of broadband technology across America, holding back Internet speeds and ultimately deepening the digital divide is total BS.

Reclassifying broadband Internet access services as a Title II telecommunications services would make it subject to common carrier regulation, a regulatory regime that is much stricter than what is currently in place. To put it bluntly, it would merely bring the internet under the same type of regulatory oversight currently provided for TV and radio. It would not discourage investment in these areas as opined by the telecommunications giants who continue to make hundreds of billions of dollars in profits already.

I am not surprised by today's ruling given that the current head of the FCC is a former telecom exec. No doubt all 5 current members of the committee will find cushy jobs waiting for them at AT&T, Verizon, Comcast or Time Warner Cable when they resign.

One of the worst rulings by a government agency in decades.....

So much for encouraging US competitiveness for small businesses, entrepreneurs and individual US citizens. The Thought Police, Big Brother and doublespeak are now firmly entrenched in our day-to-day lives..

When I started using the internet, back in the days of dial-up, I was amazed at all of the mazing things you could do and see on it, the information you could learn, the intricate sites that people made. Nowadays this awe hasn't dissipated, it has only grown stronger as the web continues to grow, expanding and evolving as websites become even better designed and the web allows people to communicate face-to-face from far away places. With the introduction of the FCCs bill, however, all of this progress could come to a screeching halt. I implore you, please tae a stand for net neutrality and vote against this proposal.

Subject: Nice job destroying the Internet and betraying the American people

What happens when you send a former lobbyist to the FCC to regulate the very same companies he used to lobby for? The miserable ruling that we got today. Yet again, the will of the American people is ignored in favour of large corporations lining our greedy government's pockets. I'm not even sure how this government can even claim to be a democracy any more. Oh wait, it's a "representative" democracy, and since corporations are considered "people" I guess that is who you represent now. There wasn't a single person outside of the government granted ISP monopolies that were in favour of this "fast-lane" proposal and you know it. Another utterly disgusting display of uncontrollable greed.

ISP's should be listed as Title II Command Carriers, and that is it. They should be providing connectivity at advertised speeds and no traffic should be prioritized over other traffic, and no traffic should be blocked. End of story. Anything less is a disservice to everyone. Broadband is largely replacing traditional phone lines as it is, which fell under common carrier rules which was clearly for the better. Broadband has become as necessary as electricity and water at this point if you want to get an education, look for work, interact with government services, etc. ISPs were given billions of tax payer money to build out infrastructure and have largely failed except at lining their executive's pockets. Even mentioning Title II to them yesterday prompted a response from all of them stating they wouldn't invest in new infrastructure which is clearly collusion. The USA has already fallen to 31st place in the world for broadband profits keep going up along with my bill. I still never get advertised speeds that I am paying for, and just yesterday they announced more data caps will follow, which will clearly stifle innovation and chance for growth. The mere thought of even considering allowing Comcast to purchase TWC is appalling. There is NO consumer choice as it is if you don't like your provider. I'm not even sure how this could be possible, but they managed to lobby for laws that prevent municipal broadband in counties where they don't even plan on building out infrastructure on their own! And the Comcast/NBC merger was another awful decision. ISP's should not be content providers at the same time as it is a clear conflict of interest. And don't tell me they will be "regulated" against unfair practices because you can't realistically monitor them and your track record clearly shows that you don't intend to in the first place.

I have absolutely no faith in this government to do right by the American people any more. As far as I am concerned you never intended to represent us and are guilty of treason against America. What are you people doing to this country!?!?!

Already internet access is more expensive in rural areas and in smaller cities where there are local service monopolies. Allowing a tiered pricing structure would only increase the inequity of internet access.

Let the telecoms have their profit. But let the public have the access we paid for over more than 25 years of R&D, and at prices NO HIGHER than those paid by large corporations.

Personally and professionally I believe the internet should be classified and regulated as a common carrier, if not publicly owned. The idea that private business always outperforms publicly owned business is simply false--true in some cases but not so in many others.

And what's with quantity discounts in the age of recognition of global resource constraints? That's physically backward, so cannot stand in the long run.

The internet was created off and idea and expanded on ideas. It was built from everyone and is not something that could be bought and only certain could use and control it; while others are forced upon those who own part of it whether they can use the internet or not. I hope you all will not pass this bill, everyone should have an equal right to the internet.

Thank you.

Dear FCC, AT&T and comcast,

I urge to reconsider your decision to limit internet use. We have the right as American citizens living in a free democratic country to have access to the internet. We did not vote to live in a country where we do not have freedom. Limiting the internet equals limiting our freedom and rights. I use the internet to get ahead in life, to find information, to apply for employment, to connect with people all over the world and to be part of the global commerce. By limiting the internet companies will lose a lot major annual profits and revenues and as a result it will negatively effect our economy.

It is crucial for the world's well-being that the internet remains accessible and fair to all. It is critical to have balanced information availability. Undue influence could cause huge problems with coping with the facts that are needed to deal with the current issues. We must have internet neutrality and fair access. Concentrations of money don't necessarily speak the critical and important truths. Keep the internet the free, fair, bustling medium that it is and keep it safe from the awful consequences of virtual censorship.

2. Put net neutrality into law so we all have equal access to all of the Internet.
3. Remove restrictions on municipalities and other local governments that want to create their own public Internet service.

Dear Chairman Wheeler,

Thanks for the chance to add my 2¢ to the Commission's crafting of this very, very important policy.

Internet providers should be deemed common carriers, with no exceptions or distinctions the types of service available to one and all.

Until now, the FCC has refused to assert that internet providers are common carriers and has refused to articulate its reasoning.

The inference drawn by everyone with an IQ above room temperature who has read about this proposal is that the FCC, particularly its chairman, a former lobbyist for the telecommunication industry, are taking care of their friends in the internet-provider industry at the expense of voters, just as it permits cable companies to bundle unwanted channels with sought-after channels in order to bloat cable-customers' bills.

All the talk about a "free marketplace" is just cheap, cynical hype intended to blur the uncomfortable and undeniable fact that the absolute last thing internet providers, cable providers, and anyone in the telecommunications industry want is a "free marketplace." Those entities, as they're now structured and managed, couldn't compete in a free marketplace. They fear a free marketplace because it would give rise to imaginative entrepreneurs who would provide the products and the services that have been available to people in most European nations for more than a decade at a fraction of the exorbitant costs now imposed on U.S. consumers with the blessing of the bought-and-paid-for FCC (Republican and Democratic), the bought-and-paid-for Congress (Republican and Democratic), and the bought-and-paid-for administration (Republican and Democratic).

All those providers bleed our economy of billions and billions of dollars every year and those dollars could be put to much, much better use to build houses, schools, hospitals, libraries, etc. Instead, the FCC permits the diversion of all that money from constructive uses to overpay for services whose costs are utterly unlinked to their costs. Rates for the internet providers, the cable companies, and, indeed, for all telecommunications systems could be slashed by up to 75% and the companies involved would still make a very respectable profit. As it now stands, those companies have a monopoly and, with the FCC's help, Congress's help, and the administration's help, that monopoly will be preserved to no voter's benefit.

We have the best government money can buy.

Net Neutrality is good because it allows free and easy sharing of ideas and information.

if you ruin that by allowing telecom companies to decide who (what websites) benefits from fast internet and who gets stuck in the slow lane during a traffic jam or who can even be accessed to at all it will lead to just another bullshit business 3 ring circus like congress where rather than the general people being looked out for it ends up being the businesses that have the most money to spend on lobbyists while the little guys just have to sit and deal with it unless they go well out of their way to make it painfully obvious that it isn't something the voters want.

in the beginning it may not be so bad to allow telecom companies to decide this kind of thing but it will end up the same as things have with the government today. people will be extremely dissatisfied by something that should have been great.

unlike congress who is filled with people who are likely just out of touch with the common populace rather than not caring, large telecom companies tend to just not care. if they provide a competing service to netflix or hulu then netflix and hulu will likely be among the first they slowly start to throttle down unless those websites can pay them enough not to which would mean either higher prices or less new content.

if anything proposals should be made by finding out what the general populace wants, not the companies or what the companies say the general populace wants, and then writing it in a way that actually does what it can to ensure the general populace gets what it wants or better.

businesses have no idea what customer service is anymore and the way they try to run the show, and these days seem to often succeed, proves it.

Net Neutrality is important-- I don't want to have to explain to children why certain sites are slower due to corporate politics. Everyone had the right to information that can be accessed freely, at the same speed as any other information.

It's also a slippery slope to censorship of certain sites, and we all know why that's a bad idea.

To Chairman Tom Wheeler and the FCC Commissioners——

FCC——

The 21st century internet is an integral part of our economy, democracy, and communication systems. America is absolutely dependent on an open internet operating on net neutrality principles.

As such, you have an obligation to regulate it as a utility. Please assert your Title II authority, and stop trying to appease the telecom giants at the expense of everyone else.

Thank you, Christian Gerhard

For over 40 years NET NEUTRALITY has been the working model on the Internet.

And it has generated explosive economic growth.

New startups had a level playing field with incumbents and could turn into billion dollar companies employing thousands of people. Just look at Google, Facebook, Twitter, Yahoo, and many others.

This proposed FCC ruling would destroy all of that by destroying the level playing field.

The Honorable Thomas Wheeler
Chairman
Federal Communications Commission
445 12th Street, SW
Washington, DC 20554

Dear Chairman Wheeler,

I urge you to lead the Federal Communications Commission (FCC) efforts to maintain net neutrality by reclassifying broadband providers as common carriers. Unfortunately, the proposed rule that passed the FCC today will undermine the principles of net neutrality and the open internet.

We must not allow for a pay-to-play internet where one company can refuse to allow fast access to another company unless they pay a premium. This type of online discrimination is unacceptable, will lead to anti-competitive behavior, and will stifle innovation. What if Verizon decided to block access to YouTube? What if a cable company decided to throttle a competing service that attempted to provide video services over the internet? What if a smaller competitor with a great idea cannot afford to pay an additional fee for access to the internet's fast lane? Again, innovation would suffer and ultimately consumers would be harmed. Everyone deserves equal access at equal speeds – no blocking and no discrimination ought to be tolerated.

You have said that you do not want to allow the creation of fast and slow lanes on the internet, but I am afraid your proposal will do just that. As you know, the January court ruling made clear that the FCC could reverse its 2002 decision and move to reclassify broadband providers as common carriers. This would allow the FCC to enforce stronger rules to ensure an open and free internet that would best serve the needs of consumers.

Again, I urge you to lead the FCC in reclassifying broadband providers as common carriers without delay in order to ensure that everyone has equal access to the internet. Thank you.

Subject: "Open" Internet Proposal Feedback
Commissioners,

I'm extremely disappointed in the lack of respect that is being displayed by even considering a proposal that would allow some internet content providers to assume priority over others simply because they are currently the big kid on the playground. Arguments that "fast lanes" would ONLY provide faster service to/from these big kids while leaving the little guys unaffected are outright lies. Anyone with a bit of common sense can figure out that very idea of a "fast lane" for a certain class of internet traffic implicitly defines a "not fast lane", or as we like to call it, a "slow lane". Technically, the only way to create a fast lane inside of an existing, finite amount of bandwidth, is to prioritize the traffic from the big kids that can pay the fees, above everything else. While you're not explicitly allowing an ISP to throttle specific traffic, the net effect is the same. It's a game of semantics that I find insulting. Content providers should be focused on creating and providing content, while internet service providers should be focused on delivering 0's and 1's to my house, no matter where they came from. This is a dangerous game, that many people rightly see as one of the biggest threats to a free and open market, so please consider carefully before selling out the people you're supposed to be watching out for.

Tom, I'm sure you'll never actually see this, but I'm sure you already know it: Any member of the general public that actually understands what an open internet is, sees you as a hand puppet for the cable companies, doing whatever you can to help secure their place between the consumer and reliable, affordable choices for internet access. Get that hand out of your ass and prove us wrong.

For the two of you that voted against moving forward: Thank You! - Please keep fighting for what is fair and right.

Sincerely,

Daniel Lawrence Caswell

Greetings Mr. Wheeler,

I am emailing you today in regards to FCC's new rules on net neutrality and the possible pay-to-play incorporation. Creating fast lanes will disrupt the current neutral internet speeds we all have the chance to use fairly and without having to pay for faster connections. This could change the freedom we all have on the internet and could end net neutrality as we know it. Please don't vote for these new rules and keep in mind the public citizens this is done for. The freedoms we the public the people want to have just as much as you do. Thanks for reading this if you did and take care. Cheers.

If you have a fast lane, then you have a slow lane as well. You cannot have one without the other.

I urge you to reconsider the fast lane track for billion dollar companies like Netflix and other. All this will do is to reduce our performance and increase our costs. The internet should be free and encumbered of this type of access.

If companies like Netflix want faster access have them build out their own private network with a new backbone that is separate and apart from the Internet. Private companies and the federal government have been doing this for years without impact to the internet.

The original vision of the internet was to share information in a free flowing and easy to use manner where everyone benefits, not just the privileged few. If this proposal passes, the internet as we now know it will cease to exist. I have been in the software development business since 1980 when I was fortunate enough to meet Bill Gates at my college. Even then, he talked about sharing information across the country and the world. Don't remove the one good thing that a regular consumer or my 79 year old parents rely on. I just do not think the seniors will understand this fast lane concept nor will they appreciate it.

Take Care!

Hello,

I grew up with the Internet. My grandmother had a service called prodigy before the World Wide Web really took off. I would look around on the offerings that prodigy included as part of the service cost. It was interesting and fun. There was also a section labeled World Wide Web which cost minutes of which my grandmother was allotted a certain amount per month. We had to use prodigy's web browser and couldn't use applications/games outside of prodigy to connect to the Internet.

I eventually lost interest in the limited offerings that prodigy have us. I didn't get back into the Internet until years later when our family got a dial up real Internet service provider which gave us true access to the Internet. I mourn the loss of those years when I could have experienced the infancy of the Internet. Allowing ISPs to erect portals and toll roads that limit people's access will be detrimental to the public interest. Monopolies have amassed so much control over our access to the Internet that they easily could exert horrible influence without consumers having other options. The FCC must classify ISPs as common carriers. Let information on the Internet be free. I pay significant sums to access the Internet, not what the only option I have to access the Internet deems it to be. Stop monopolists from ruining the Internet.

Sincerely,

John McMullen

Subject: Net Neutrality

You want to hear what the public thinks about Net Neutrality? I would think that the hundreds of thousands of names on petitions would have told you something, but it sounds like you didn't get it.

So, I'm taking a moment out of my work day to tell you what I think. DON'T create a fast lane/slow lane, multi-tiered internet! I'm self-employed, I work hard everyday, often online & couldn't afford to have internet at a speed I require to do my work if you muck up the current system.

Do you work for all of the American people? Or only for the super-rich, media conglomerates who would rake in even more money? There's already very little competition in my area for broadband internet service. I already feel pretty choiceness when it comes to my internet provider. This will undoubtedly make it worse.

If you say OK to a scheme like this, you affect my ability to continue to earn a living. I hope this helps you understand what people are thinking.

To the FCC,

I live in a rural location in northern Idaho. Our internet access is already fairly limited, both to providers (1) and speed. Giving large companies the financial ability to preempt faster speeds will only serve to exacerbate our already below average access speed. It will also serve to increase rates for the faster speeds thereby restricting internet access even further for both rural areas and lower income people. By turning the internet into a more competitive arena, based on costs, you will only serve to restrict access to an ever growing segment of the population. Please keep internet access and speeds on a level field for all, not just the wealthy.

Subject: Open Internet and the monopoly Oligopoly problem has to stop!

I undertand a lot of things about net neutrality, but what I do not understand is why the last mile has been such a monopoly in all areas. The Time warner, Comcast buy-out is STUPID as it will only cause inflated pries and more of a "raping" of the american public. I have ZERO choice in high speed internet and Comcast knows that, so they constantly try to raise prices, while giving less and less. When I have issues I have to spend hours on the phone, then wait and hear there B.S. stories that if I had a Comcast router/ modem, then I wouldn't have the issues i am having. Then when I absolutely reuse to get ripped off renting their stuff, it gets fixed. - It is an obvious ploy to get me to agree to be ripped off.

I've complained in the double digits to the BBB, Comcast, and anyone else who will listen, but still I have ONE CHOICE to get Highspeed internet. They know it and they treat me and everyone else like idiots and try to get as much profit from us as they can. Their service is awful, but I have no choice. If we let thesse companies dictate how we receive information, then we are left with the worsening internet and continued problems from these corporations.

Comcast is obviously trying to turn internet traffic into a metered commodity like wireless and charge as much as they can get away with, while they refuse to upgrade their own infrastructure and lie to everyone about it.

Wake up and do something to stop this from continuing to happen. Everyone sees it, but nothing is being done about it and enough is enough.

Subject: NET NEUTRALITY AND HIGH SPEED ACCESS NOW

Dear Chairman Wheeler,

I am pleased to see a long overdue push toward updating current legislation concerning American access to the internet, but I am very disappointed to read that the current proposal would allow “fast-lane” and “slow-lane” web usage at the discretion of internet service providers. We MUST as a country ensure prompt and equal access to information, money, trade, and communication. Allowing companies that provide server access to control and prioritize the delivery of web content sets an extremely dangerous precedent, and potentially yields authority that should fall under the control of elected officials to private multinational corporations. Like many or most citizens today, my finances, my work, my communications with friends and family, indeed my life, are all on the internet. What is being proposed would place my ISP as a barrier between me and everything that allows me to be an economically productive and politically engaged citizen.

I, along with the majority of Americans, support nothing less than FULL NET NEUTRALITY. This is absolutely critical to our nation’s future economic success and general welfare. Our government needs to follow the UK in providing incentives for high-speed access and penalties for monopolization of access to information to make sure that the US retains the ability to compete in a globalized market. Net neutrality is also critical to the success of startup corporations and small businesses.

Please act now for our country’s economic health and our citizen’s individual interests.

Sincerely,
Kathryn Sikes

Subject: Net Neutrality - Its Essential for Business Growth
Mr. Wheeler

I am the co-founder of a 3D printing business. It's an exciting time to be a part of a rapidly changing technology field. I rely on swift internet access to download and upload large files on a daily basis. My margins are thin and as a startup, I can't always afford to pay myself. If I am forced to pay even higher costs for good connectivity, it will have a deleterious effect on my business. I am not the only person in this situation.

Allowing Net Neutrality to fall to the wayside will have far reaching, almost universally dire consequences for business and eventually for our democracy. Disenfranchising the public from a service that is quickly becoming essential to life in our connected age in favor of the profit margins of a few large telecommunications companies is just bad business.

Please keep net neutrality intact.

Thank you

To Whom It May Concern:

I am deeply concerned and gravely disappointed that the FCC would propose rules that would allow "pay for priority" in any form when considering the net neutrality issue. Allowing for ANY situation in which an Internet service provider (ISP's) can charge content companies for faster and more reliable delivery of their traffic is appalling. In a free and accessible internet, ISP's should be prevented from holding content hostage for higher fees. ISP's already charge customers to deliver this content. They should not then be allowed to charge content companies on the other end as well. This will result in unfair cost increases to consumers. This will also provide unfair advantage to established companies with deep pockets at the expense of smaller innovative companies.

I urge the FCC to reconsider. Any such deal that allows pay for priority should be banned as it results in performance extortion.

I was deeply disappointed to hear that the Federal Communications Commission is planning on implementing rule changes that would allow Internet service providers to pay for special, faster lanes to deliver their content. In an environment where large corporations can pay for faster service, start-ups and every day Internet users won't be able to compete and we will lose the open, free-flowing exchange of information that has made the Internet so dynamic and integral to our lives.

The FCC can ensure it has the tools to act by reclassifying broadband as a telecommunications service. I urge you to reject the new rules and to take this vital and common sense step toward protecting net neutrality.

It is unconscionable to all allow ISPs to fleece content providers in a way that will create an uneven playing field for less wealthy competitors. Consumers will not benefit from this decision. All of your talk about openness rings hollow at this point.

ISPs should not be allowed to build their business models on FCC rules that enable them to be the troll on the bridge.

This is all about maximizing ISP profits, not building an open and functional internet that maximizes consumer benefit.

Exactly whom are you working for?

I strongly oppose any proposal that would allow ISPs to charge content providers for streamlined and/or preferential delivery of data. ISPs are already charging customers for access and infrastructure and have already been given government money to assist in building infrastructure. Where is the audit on all of that money?

The ISPs' desire to alter FCC regulation to allow for the charging of content providers would be something like cities charging pizza delivery drivers for using public roads (already funded and maintained by public dollars) or for access to "special delivery lanes" so they can get their pizza to customers faster than their competitors. Any such scheme will clearly lead to an uneven playing field that will always favor the wealthiest of companies to the detriment of new innovative companies that can't "pay to play", as it were. Consumers will be harmed by this.

Please do not allow the ISP's to become a troll demanding tribute from content providers who cross the bridge that ISP customers are already paying for. That kind of system is not open, even though some may deceptively say it is. It is not right and should not be allowed, regardless of how much money the ISPs throw around.

If you let the ISPs do this now, there will be no going back. Consumers will be harmed by this.

Please vote your conscience on this one.

Sincerely,

Derrick Smith

Subject: I am in favor of a free and open internet protected by strong net neutrality rules
Dear Mr. Wheeler, and FCC commissioners,

I am a technologist who has been working with the internet for over ten years. I am currently a web developer. As someone who grew up with the dawn of the internet, and who has made it a central part of their life and career, I feel especially obliged to comment on the decision made today (May 15 2014) that does not explicitly prohibit special deals that give certain entities prioritized use of the internet over other users.

It is the explicit duty of the telecommunications commission to act in the interest of the general public. I believe that today's decision fails to meet that mandate. The internet is like any other medium of communication, whether it be letters, telephone calls, or telegraph messages. As such, the Internet has historically been a place for free exchange of information on a two way street, between anyone for any reason of whatever nature. Let's keep it that way. The Internet is not and should not be a content distribution network by design, and should not be allowed to be subverted into one by special corporate interests.

I am in favor of a free and open internet protected by strong net neutrality rules.

If everyone plays by the same rules, new innovations are possible. If we let the big players take over now, it could stifle future innovation. For example, Youtube is an important place for exchange of videos, but one day an entirely new protocol could evolve which replaces the hub and spoke architecture of such services. Instead, distributed nodes of self organized agents would exchange content with one another without an intermediary (much like BitTorrent). However, this evolution could become impossible on the proposed "deregulated" Internet. It is quite likely, under the proposed regulation, that one day virtually all video transmitted through the internet must come from a select number of "premium" providers. It would then be impossible for video to be shared by distributed peers acting freely of their own accord without any intermediary services - services with their own business priorities, and respective Terms of Use agreements (TOUs that like today we have no other option but to consent to, because of the ubiquity of the service). The Internet we once knew as a catalyst for innovation, freedom of speech, and cultural evolution could one day become a dull and stagnant content delivery network for a few big business.

Thank you for your time. The future of our society, and the world, depends on it.

Subject: Lacklustre net neutrality proposal

Dear Mr. Wheeler et al.

I was deeply disappointed to read today that you have decided to continue with your proposal to allow Internet 'fast lanes' while giving no concrete explanations or justifications as to how this wouldn't cause the many problems that have been suggested and in some cases are already happening, only questionably and not yet with impunity. Your response effectively asked us to just "trust you", while simultaneously giving us all the reason we need not to.

You say that you would like to hear from the public on what the final decision should be, giving the opportunity for it to be changed. I would have thought that with the considerably large push from many internet users to re-classify ISPs as Title Two Common Carriers, or at the very least not implement this problematic proposal, it should be clear what the public would like at this point.

I, like many others, hope that the best decision is made in the end; not leaving the US to fall behind the rest of the world even further and suffer a tiered, broken and monopolized Internet. Unfortunately, however, the traces of influence from higher powers-that-be show that it's not a good idea for me to hold my breath.

Kind regards,

A concerned member of the public.

Hi, my name is Reed Mencke and I live in Patagonia, Arizona.

I understand that chairman Wheeler is considering new rules that would in essence give certain large corporations a fast lane on the internet while leaving the rest of America (its true citizens) slower access. In the modern world the internet is the is a crucial tool that helps insure every citizen has the same basic ability to access information and communicate. Corporations are not citizens (despite the flawed Citizens America decision. A corporate fast lane is another step down the slippery slope towards America becoming a corporate oligarchy. The fast lane rules would be a special privilege for big corporations and would stack the deck against needed innovation by small businesses and individual citizens. Fast lane rule constitutes a serious violation of equality and democracy. America already has some of the slowest, most expensive Internet access in the world. The FCC should be making the Internet better for us -- not slowing down the Internet, raising costs, and hurting innovation.

The new FCC Chair should carry out President Obama's promise and support Net Neutrality. If he won't, he should step down so the president can appoint someone who will stand up for Internet freedom and make the Internet better for all of us.

This is not reaching anyone who makes policy, but it is reaching you, and that's good enough for me.

Let's keep this quick; we're both busy people.

There is a specific and imperative reason for the Internet to remain an open communication medium: we will totally lose our status as a world superpower if we allow our children to lose access to the single greatest learning tool in history.

Oh, sure. They won't "lose access," so to speak. They'll just have to wonder why they can't access certain sites as quickly as others, and why certain content providers' media is given priority over content that actually interests the child.

I don't want to have to give my kid (I'm not a parent yet, but I will be) a lesson in how the government cares more about cable companies than in education and free communication. I don't want to raise a child in a country that holds the greatest medium for the worldwide exchange of ideas for ransom.

If the FCC doesn't categorize the Internet as free from corporate meddling, I will need to think seriously about the future of my family in this country.

Dear FCC,

I am writing to oppose rules that will allow for discrimination on the Internet - where the wealthy can purchase faster Internet service and everyone else continues to have slower service.

I do not want telecom giants and wealthy Internet companies to determine the future of the Internet. I want new ideas to flourish on the Internet and not be blocked because they do not have sufficient funds to purchase fast service and compete.

I do not want the Internet to be turned into another vehicle that allows money to flow from working Americans to the wealthiest -- where web-based services like Netflix purchase faster service and pass the costs on to consumers.

The proposal being considered would kill rather than protect Net Neutrality and allow rampant discrimination online. The Internet should be viewed as a public good and should be operated consistent with our rights to Freedom of Speech and Freedom of the Press. Turning the Internet into a pay to play scheme is unacceptable.

I would like to take a minute to tell you how disappointed I am that you continue to push forward with the Internet Fast lane proposal. These rules are going to make it much more expensive for businesses like ours, and will drastically reduce our flexibility to do business. As a consumer of Internet services I also feel like there will be much increased costs, and much less choice on services. This will drastically reduce our country's ability to compete as an innovator in Internet services. Please re-consider this course of action and do what the FCC was designed for, Protect the consumer's interests.

Dear FCC,

I'm sending this E-mail as a Canadian Ex-pat living in Barbados. I've had access to the internet since 1994, and I'm truly frightened by some of the legislation I've seen proposed. Currently the internet is the great equalizer. No matter where you come from or who you are you can access the same information as everybody else or have your voice heard. A good idea can rise to the top no matter where or who it originates from. Many people, myself included, consider the internet a resource - comparable to running water or electricity. Please protect it. I know there's a precedent where telephone companies were designated Title II Common Carriers back in 1934. I believe Internet Service Providers should be reclassified as such, that way the internet can remain a level playing field for all. These decisions effect everyone all over the world, not just Americans, and have ramifications that could last for generations.

Subject: Reclassifying Broadband

Dear Chairman and Commissioners,

The future of the open Internet is in your hands. And yet you have proposed rules that would actually break it.

Your proposed path would open the door to widespread discrimination online. It would give Internet service providers the green light to implement pay-for-priority schemes that would be a disaster for startups, nonprofits and everyday Internet users who cannot afford these unnecessary tolls.

I urge you to scrap these proposed rules and instead restore the principle of online nondiscrimination by reclassifying broadband as a telecommunications service.

Listen to the voice of the people and not the voice of those who seek to profit by hobbling the people. We created the internet; we should lead the world in speed and access, and yet these same folks who you have today sided with are the reason we don't.

Do the right thing. Reclassify broadband.

Mr. Wheeler,

The ARPANET - forerunner of the Internet was developed with tax payers' money. TCP/IP - the communication protocol used to transmit data across the Internet was developed by Robert Kahn and Vint Cerf while working on a government grant. At the time, no telecomm wanted to help, as they didn't see any profit in it. Now, they ALL want in. Fine. When Verizon, or AT&T, or Time Warner, etc. devise their OWN protocol, AND get everyone on the entire planet to use it, they can dictate who gets FAST service and who doesn't. Until then, the Internet should be equal for all.

Subject: Net Neutrality
Sir or Ma'am,

As the internet represents a marketplace for ideas and open communication as well as commerce, internet service providers must not be offered a conflict of interest in throttling or facilitating traffic at their discretion. The only "fast lane" traffic should be that with a legitimate engineering requirement for higher speeds (VoIP, Unified Communications, etc.). Allowing internet service providers to make that distinction on their own, with or without the formal approval and oversight of a court, is an affront to the engineers that design and publish standards and protocols for widespread use.

The United States has a strong and well-founded tradition of favoring commerce in conflicts such as this, so consider that commerce is catalyzed more by the open and free exchange of ideas and information than by immediate exploitation of consumers' access to services. In a world where the market could be allowed to shift as service providers do or do not manipulate traffic, the concept of a "fast-lane" dictated by service providers could make sense. As it stands, changing service providers, especially for businesses, is a costly and time-intensive process. For many businesses and consumers, there is only one option. In allowing service providers to throttle traffic based on source rather than technology, market landscapes become less competitive and immediately favor larger, more established organizations.

The slippery slope fallacy could easily be applied to note that, if allowed to throttle traffic from content delivery businesses, internet service providers could easily shift to throttling or slowing traffic to other business websites. While one does not necessarily lead to the other, the potential for such a shift in internet usage can not be ignored when the ability to implement legal controls to combat such business activities is too slow to effectively prevent this type of action from destroying a business. In other words: the government would have no ability to protect a start-up from being extorted by a service provider. As start-ups are increasingly important to the expanding global economy and technological advancement, this danger must be considered.

In closing, thank you for opening this topic up to public comment. My observations are based solely on my somewhat limited personal experience and understanding of business operations and activities. I hope I've provided qualitative feedback and look forward to the ongoing improvement of cooperative international governance of internet policy.

There is no need for an internet "fast lane". This is a scam being pushed by the last mile providers because their current infrastructure is woefully inadequate for the coming traffic demands. We consumers already pay our ISP's tiered amounts of money for greater bandwidth. This usurious quantity of money should already allow our ISP's to upgrade their infrastructure. But because they're only interested in continually increasing profits, and not providing service, they use our money to line their pockets instead of upgrading their infrastructure. You should REQUIRE these last mile providers to maintain sufficient infrastructure so that they can meet their peak bandwidth requirements, not their average.

Your proposal to create fast lanes for the internet is basically a land grab for the largest internet corporations like Comcast, Verizon and Time Warner. A policy to benefit these specific companies and fatten their pocketbooks at the expense of everyone else in this country, like small businesses and individuals. The UN has said that the internet is now a basic human right, a common carrier utility like water or power that should be regulated for the benefit of everyone inclusively and not for the exclusive benefit of certain corporations to charge what they want. The internet has been treated as a common carrier in this country for years and this has allowed the spread of information and ideas regardless of their source or the content of the information that is transmitted. This has benefitted this country tremendously in jobs, creativity and business development. These rules would allow companies like Comcast to mute some ideas, particularly ones that these large corporations dislike, and at the same time to squeeze larger companies for greater profits. I think these proposed rules are a threat to this country's economic future as well as to our democratic future and the internet should be regulated as a common carrier.

Dear FCC,

I am writing to oppose rules that will allow for discrimination on the Internet - where the wealthy can purchase faster Internet service and everyone else continues to have slower service.

I do not want telecom giants and wealthy Internet companies to determine the future of the Internet. I want new ideas to flourish on the Internet and not be blocked because they do not have sufficient funds to purchase fast service and compete.

I do not want the Internet to be turned into another vehicle that allows money to flow from working Americans to the wealthiest -- where web-based services like Netflix purchase faster service and pass the costs on to consumers.

The proposal being considered would kill rather than protect Net Neutrality and allow rampant discrimination online. The Internet should be viewed as a public good and should be operated consistent with our rights to Freedom of Speech and Freedom of the Press. Turning the Internet into a pay to play scheme is unacceptable.

The fact that the internet isn't regulated like a utility yet is reprehensible. If you think that allowing multiple 'lanes' be paid for through broadband is acceptable you're obviously in favor of turning our society into a caste based system where it's pay to win. Your already questionable past when in such a post as the head of the FCC only leads us to believe that you're literally just a sell out to the highest bidder.

Dear Chairman Wheeler,

I, along with most consumers, am strongly in favor of regulating access to high-speed broadband internet as a utility. We MUST as a country ensure prompt and equal access to information, money, trade, and communication. Allowing companies that provide server access to control and prioritize the delivery of web content sets an extremely dangerous precedent, and potentially yields authority that should fall under the control of elected officials to private multinational corporations.

Our government needs to follow the UK in providing incentives for high-speed access and penalties for monopolization of access to information to make sure that the US retains the ability to compete in a globalized market. Net neutrality is also critical to the success of startup corporations and small businesses.

Please act now for our country's economic health and our citizen's individual interests.

Subject: I Support Net Neutrality
Chairman Wheeler,

Do not do anything to endanger the future of net-neutrality, as it is currently understood.

That last phrase is crucial, because net neutrality is currently understood to mean unfettered and equal access to legal content, no matter the source of the request, the frequency of the request, or the service provider that services the request. Do not attempt to redefine a term to tell the American people that massive changes are not really any changes at all. Clearly, the telecomm companies want to change away from net-neutrality, hence Verizon's recent suit that brought this all about.

"Fastlane" (which by default means slow lanes for anyone who can't pay) proposals are euphemisms for payola style schemes that will endanger customers' access to content, stifle innovation, and could even lead to the throttling of political dissent by large corporations with near-monopoly power. All across the US, we already deal with cable television blackouts of content due to cost disputes between content and cable companies. Given that these same cable providers are the ones in question, there is no reason to believe we would see the same thing occur--only it would not be an argument over whether or not I can watch AMC's Mad Men but a question as to whether or not I could access the New York Times, CNN, The Economist or content from whichever company or blogger my current ISP is in disagreement with.

In fact, short of a court battle, without a neutral and open internet there would be no way to prevent these large media companies from preventing me from reaching content that might make me complain about their service--content which, due to their ability to restrict it, I might not even know exists! This Catch-22 situation is the antithesis of the Internet since it first became a tool for public discourse.

If the companies believe they need more money to supply customers with services, let them raise their prices in a competitive environment and let the market sort it out. If I had a choice between Time Warner, Comcast, Verizon, and Google, I'd be glad to choose the one that fit my budget--but don't have me pay for service only to be told that because the Washington Post Group refuses to pay Verizon what it demands, I'll have my access to both Slate and Amazon restricted or slowed since they're both owned by the same owner.

When I pay for internet service, I should not be held hostage to the whims of my service providers--this is the way the internet has been and should always be. Anything else would be a disservice to the open discourse we enjoy as Americans.

Subject: Net Neutrality and Communications

Is it true that the FCC may give phone companies permission to stop maintaining old networks by 2020?

If so, then there should be little debate concerning the course for net neutrality--designate ISPs as telecommunications companies and require them to lay out the last mile, for which they were already paid! Without this requirement, how will the FCC ensure that all Americans have access to some form of landline phone service, such as VOIP? Do you realize the same companies which function as ISPs (Verizon) also function as telecommunications companies and are neglecting their legal obligations in order to push people into higher cost phone services? Where is the FCC whose responsibility it is to ensure equal access to basic communication for all people?

The FCC needs to use its power to ensure that there are at least two or three ISPs in every region. In western NY, there is an agreement between TWC and Verizon as to where the jurisdiction of each ends and there is no competition for hi-speed internet (10mbps minimum)! The ISPs are functioning as monopolies and no matter how much I complain that my internet and/or phone (VOIP) connection goes down every other week because of a problem with the ISP, nothing changes!

Lastly, why should ISPs be allowed to promote their own products at the expense of their competitors? Why is Comcast or TWC or Verizon allowed to throttle access speed to websites that compete with their own websites/products? Why can some people not stream YouTube or NetFlix when they already pay the ISP? If companies are forced to pay ISPs extra to allow their customers to access their services, where does it end? What about small businesses who might want to compete but can't afford to pay extra tolls? Why would the FCC tolerate ISPs threatening to not upgrade their infrastructure if they are designated as TC companies or net neutrality laws (equal access in speed to all websites) are enforced? What have ISPs done to upgrade their infrastructure without net neutrality or being designated as telecommunications companies?

Please go read some tech sites: arstechnica, extremetech, dailymtech, anandtech, etc., and educate yourselves on the impoverished state of broadband services in this country and the plight of many who live in the last mile areas. ISPs are becoming the new Ma-Bell and the FCC needs to act now!

It would give Internet service providers the green light to implement pay-for-priority schemes that would be a disaster for startups, nonprofits and everyday Internet users who cannot afford these unnecessary tolls.

Subject: Make Broadband a Utility
<mailto:[REDACTED]> To whom it may concern,

I am deeply troubled by the proposed Open Internet rules that the FCC has proposed. Without resorting to finger pointing, hyperbole, or excessive limited metaphors, I will say that the internet should categorically be treated as a utility.

The Open Internet orders will not allow an ISP to slow down service to certain websites, but the effect of giving better service to the highest bidder will be the same as slowing down those who did not come to the table.

The most important and useful websites I access are much the same as Wikipedia, which is not run for profit. I doubt highly they will be able to pay for the enhanced access that Netflix and other heavy hitters can. While I understand that total bandwidth applied to Wikipedia is miniscule when compared to Netflix's streaming videos, the concept is terrifying to me that truly altruistic websites and those that represent an objective good in the world would be effectively shut out if the issue they champion is not profitable enough.

For this and many other reasons, I urge the FCC to go back to 2002 and declare broadband internet a utility. Just as the rich should not be guaranteed sweeter water or brighter electricity, they should not have access to content more useful than the rest can afford. Is there a paying section for the good books at the library?

Thank you for opening up this issue for comment.

Net neutrality wouldn't even be an issue if corporations hadn't gained the power--by leaps and bounds in the past decade-- that they now wield. It may be impossible to withstand, but I urge you in the FCC to hold out as long as you can. This is only occurring because since the 1980s, our government has capitulated again and again to corporate interests. Merger after merger eroded the healthy competition that is supposed to characterize our economic system. One need only look at the two cable system (and soon to be just one FCC?) that now regulate so much of America's viewing choices. I'm sure you're familiar with the refrain, "200 channels and nothing to watch." That's because there is NO COMPETITION. The situation will only continue to erode if the internet is monetized by the greedy elite for whom enough is never enough.

Just say 'no' to oligarchy.

Tom,

I'm sure you've heard from many citizens who use the internet daily to complete a great many tasks and entertainment.

In its current structure we the consumer and the content providers already pay a service fee and have an agreed upon service arrangement. To have internet service providers to now say that some content providers should pay more than others is an unfair business practice.

To restrict the internet and give these ISPs increased power to limit innovation and limit our access to sites that cannot afford their inflated premium charges will only reduce all the good an open internet can give us.

I urge you to consider the need for all citizens in this modern age to have fair access to the entire internet. Please make internet service providers classified as a utility that cannot be arbitrarily throttled.

Subject:
Mr. Wheeler,

I'm a simple citizen. A small business owner. And up until recently, I was a hostage.

Let me explain; like so many Americans, I use Netflix. I'm also locked into Comcast as my only choice of ISP for broadband services as no other service providers in my area offer anything close to the actual speeds required to do something as simple as stream Netflix. However, last year I started noticing that Netflix was taking longer to load, and had to frequently pause. It also stopped arriving in HD, so the picture quality was worse. Amazon's Prime streaming service didn't have this issue, and independent speed tests confirmed that my personal connection wasn't the problem. I started researching online and found that I wasn't alone. I don't profess to be an expert, but my understanding is that Comcast was having an issue delivering Netflix content because it didn't maintain proper connections with the internet backbone provider that Netflix uses to connect to the internet. They didn't maintain these connections because to do so would cost Comcast extra money since Comcast (as you would expect, being a consumer oriented service) is a net taker of internet data. As you know, Netflix recently agreed to pay Comcast (and even more recently, Verizon) extra money to ensure Netflix content arrives at a high quality to Comcast subscribers. Not surprisingly, shortly after agreeing to pay Comcast and Verizon, Netflix announced a price increase. This is the future, unless you take steps now.

Simply put, this is unacceptable to me, and demonstrates a massive issue with the way we regulate ISPs. That Comcast and Verizon were able to extract an extra toll out of Netflix to simply provide the service they already agreed to provide to me as a customer isn't right, is anti-consumer, and will ultimately stifle innovation. I hesitate to say it, but you should listen to the list of over 100 internet based companies that recently petitioned the FCC to reject the proposal that would allow fast lanes to consumers. They understand, like I do, the dangers of allowing ISPs to be paid on both ends. This isn't how the internet was created, and we shouldn't change it now. The internet has been THE great democratizing force in the last 20 years. Please don't undo that.

As you know, the FCC has the ability to stop this sort of activity dead in its track by classifying ISPs as common carriers. I strongly urge you to make the decision to do so. I recognize that there is a lot of industry push back on this, and it won't be a popular decision in some corners. Nevertheless, your duty is to people like me, the average citizen, who will continue to see his bills increase and his service get worse if you don't take this action now. I'm highly skeptical of the recent comments of the ISPs stating that their investment in infrastructure will decrease if they are regulated as common carriers, and their statements belie the fact that they've already been relatively slow in upgrading capacity compared to many other first world countries because of their monopolistic stranglehold on most of the areas they operate in.

I rely on the internet to interact with my clients at work, and for entertainment and interaction at home. I'm not a crusader, and I don't tend to petition my government much. But my concern has prompted me to reach out to you, and I hope you take my comments into consideration as you make these important decisions.

Regards,

Subject: The internet is a public utility

To Chairman Tom Wheeler and the FCC Commissioners——

The internet is central to American life and the modern economy. It makes no sense to regulate it as a private "service." It is a public utility and should be treated as such.

Please declare the internet to be a public utility

TO whom it may concern: There are few issues that I feel as passionate about as that which is currently before the FCC - net neutrality. I am not a techie, a programmer or a computer geek, I am representative of most internet users who use the internet for education, entertainment and information. There has been no technology in the past 40 years that has impacted my life to the extent that a free internet has. I believe that it is the equal playing field of the internet that has fostered the freedom of speech, spread of knowledge, development of technology and provided equal access that characterizes the current www. I implore the FCC to maintain the current system of internet traffic regulation -- the neutral net is crucial for small businesses, large businesses and innovation, and the neutral net is what has been the impetus for the explosion of personal expression and freedom that characterizes the www.

Dear FCC/Chairman/Commissioners,

The future of the open Internet is in your hands. And yet you have proposed rules that would actually break it.

Your proposed path would open the door to widespread discrimination online. It would give Internet service providers the green light to implement pay-for-priority schemes that would be a disaster for startups, nonprofits and everyday Internet users who cannot afford these unnecessary tolls.

I urge you to scrap these proposed rules and instead restore the principle of online nondiscrimination by reclassifying broadband as a telecommunications service.

I'm righting this with little faith that you will make the right decision on this matter.

I fail to see how you can hold this position without there being a major conflict of interest, but that seems to be the way of it now all this appointing men and women from corporate world to positions of power in the federal government so they can control the outcome of decisions that affect the American people.

The internet was paid for by the American people, for the people. While I feel that those who privately paid for the infostrutcher to provide access to everyone should make a nominal profit let's keep in mind that we contributed to it by paying our bills on time so we hold interest in it to.

I keep a close eye on the amounts of revenue they many corporations make each year and since the beginning of the bush era and mass deregulation the margins have gone up and up. It's breaking the backs of Americans.

It is not right that those with money and power can hijack the political system to further their greedy pursuits.

Keep in mind that if you continue to take everything you can from the people at every opportunity you will fail. Where will your revenues come from when we are all broke and have nothing left to give. You're like a virus that continues to consume its host till it dies instead of a symbiotic relationship where everyone benefits.

This is what we the people overwhelmingly want. This is what the creative entrepreneurs that have made the internet what it is and what we want. Remember if it weren't for them sparking our interests, there would not be this debate right now.

I would ask you please. Do what is Wright, uphold the position that you hold. The FCC is there to protect the people not big corpora.

Subject: Net Neutrality
Dear Commissioner,

With the recent approval of the plan to allow ISPs to open up "Internet Fast Lanes" for certain websites and services, I have very real concerns about the future of Net Neutrality. ISPs have enough power as it is; with the difficulty in entering into this market, many ISPs have a monopoly over their service area and can charge whatever they want for mediocre service, since in many areas consumers only have one choice: pay outrageous prices for bad service or go without Internet altogether. Even in populated urban areas, many users only have a choice between two or three providers, and often none of their available choices are very good. With ISPs having so little incentive to improve their service as it is (why offer a competitive service when there's no competition?), I seriously doubt that giving ISPs the ability to offer "fast lanes" to certain services will actually improve consumers' Internet experience in any way. Rather, I fear that ISPs will use this ruling to throttle Internet speeds for most sites while blackmailing established services with high-bandwidth requirements into paying more just to continue reaching their customers. Further, what hope does a new, upstart small business have of reaching new customers when they won't have the means to pay the ISPs their bandwidth tolls? This ruling is a death knell to small online businesses.

I urge you to reconsider your position on this issue. After all, this decision can only be bad news for consumers.

Sincerely,

A Concerned Citizen

I was deeply disappointed to hear that the Federal Communications Commission is planning on implementing rule changes that would allow Internet service providers to pay for special, faster lanes to deliver their content. In an environment where large corporations can pay for faster service, start-ups and every day Internet users won't be able to compete and we will lose the open, free-flowing exchange of information that has made the Internet so dynamic and integral to our lives.

Dear Mr. Wheeler,

Once again money seems to rule our country.. Are we really a democracy? Or are we an Oligarchy?

Ruining net neutrality for profits is a sad thing.

They have already left out many small areas in the US for basic broadband and I am sure it is that they are not a lucrative market. This is once again ALL about money and their ability to hold the wallets in captivity of who will be left to afford the internet. Not a good thing to uplift our nation in a struggling economy.

Tell them to work on upgrading the quality of the system (connectivity and capacity) so the internet will be a benefit and open to all who uses it.

Once they capture the money what incentives will they have to innovate?

Try to think with you heart and how this will affect the less fortunate than yourself.

Sincerely,

Mrs. Warren Johnson

I am an independent internet music publisher and a public educator. I see the establishment of so-called "fast lanes" as a direct threat to all of my professional activities.

By establishing a paid "fast lane," smaller web-based services will by definition receive inferior service speeds from the affected network providers. For me as a small content publisher, this is a crushing blow to my ability to distribute music files in mp3 or PDF format. It already takes a significant amount of time for most consumers to download these products. An intentional bottleneck engineered by an ISP will make sharing my content even more difficult.

For independent artists in any medium, net neutrality is an issue of free-speech access to the public. An open internet is driven by what people decide they want to consume. This gives small artists the ability to compete on a more level playing field with others who have more resources. With the exception of illegal activities like child pornography, the infrastructure of the internet should not discriminate based on the content provided or the money backing that content. The infrastructure must be neutral so that content consumers can truly choose.

Politically, net neutrality is also a big deal. What if one political candidate is willing to pay a corporation for fast-lane access for his website, while his opponent does not pay in order to avoid an apparent conflict of interest? Will the speed of internet service tip the scales in an election? The possibility is not unreasonable.

On the education side, the websites and web-based services that are most useful to education are not often the most popular or well-funded ventures. Certainly many of these tools will not qualify for an internet "fast lane." Should large corporations have the authority to decide which educational content is worthy to be shared at high bandwidth? That sets a dangerous precedent. We have enough revisionist history already; ISPs do not need to be in the business of rewriting the curriculum by making certain pieces of educational content more accessible than others.

The internet today is far from perfect, but an internet that functions as a puppet with corporations holding the strings of content access will become a dystopian nightmare.

To Whom It May Concern:

I wish to preserve Net Neutrality and not permit cable/telecom companies to allow a "fast lane" that might favor one company's traffic over another. I firmly believe they should be reclassified as Title II and regulated as a utility. That is what they've become. The Internet is an absolute necessity in the 21st Century. Innovation could be seriously compromised. ISPs have, I believe, a stranglehold already. They have regional monopolies as DSL and satellite are currently not viable competitors for the speeds necessary. As such, my choice for cable - for example - is either Time Warner or . . . . That's it. Time Warner. That's not competition. I'd go so far as to say it should be investigated as anti-trust.

We are far behind other developed nations in broadband speed and I don't believe allowing Comcast and their ilk to charge even more fees (and make even more profit) should be permitted. They need to be regulated and "encouraged" (i.e. forced) to reinvest in infrastructure and improvement. They've shown they're not willing to do so, from what I've seen. Otherwise, why is the U.S.A. so far behind in broadband speed and infrastructure.

Anyway, I've said my (more than) $0.02. Please do what is right for the citizens of the United States of America and reclassify them as Title II so the FCC can finally regulate them properly.

Subject: ISPs as Title II Common Carriers - Yes
Commissioner,

I'm writing today to support classification of ISPs as Title II Common Carriers. The internet is as much a utility as my water or electric, and the same is true of all working-class middle income families. It MUST be true if lower-income families are to better their lives and pursue the "American Dream".

The ISPs are lobbying you (and have already lobbied you, and in the past have paid you) to overlook this point. Please do the right thing. The future of this country is, in some ways, in your hands at this time. History will remember your decision and the way you choose to proceed. Anything less than classification of ISPs as Title II Common Carriers will not enhance your legacy and will not further the long-term interests of the United States of America.

I work for an ISP. You and I both know they make enough money already. They do not require additional income streams. Do the right thing.

Thank you for your attention to this matter.

Hi There,

Pretty sure you have received a torrent of emails already, but despite the fact I live in the UK the developments of this 'fast-lane' concept in America are worrying enough for me to try to send you an email.

In an age of overwhelming distrust in corporate conduct and people being squeezed and more concerned about the future than ever, it is saddening that there is a possibility of adding another depressing layer of monopolised soulless exploitation. I'm not a conspiracy theorist but you'd have to be an idiot not to realise that people are being taken advantage of, all the time.

Please stop this - Net Neutrality is important, not a buzz-word. Free markets must function properly in line with capitalist ideals to make sure everyone's quality of life improves as the economy does.

Mr Wheeler, I worry that I may be emailing too late, but I really hope that the FCC makes the best decision for working Americans and small businesses by keeping the net neutrality laws in place. Huge corporations are already screwing over small businesses in so many ways, and I am already paying very high premiums for basic internet access. Changing the law to benefit multi-billion dollar companies is not in the best interests of the American people, and while you are appointed by the executive branch (instead of elected), your job is to watch out for the American people.

Our country looks like a fuckin joke when it comes to internet speeds! We let the ISP's continue to take our wallets for outdated tech! There is no reason our speeds should be the fastest in the world. But of course the only way we will get it is if we pay out the ass for it.

I am appalled at the proposed regulations. It makes me question whether the FCC is working for the American people or the cable industry they should be regulating. The proposed rules provide a framework to allow ISP's to essentially raise prices for consumers across the board. Even if they don't directly charge consumers for an 'internet fast lane', the prices they charge to content providers are just going to be passed along as fees and price hikes to the consumer. It's incredibly unfair to preserve the absurd oligopoly of the cable companies, and it's even worse to essentially allow them to commit the modern day equivalent of highway robbery. Instead of creating an open internet, the FCC is creating a series of toll roads heavily weighted against the American public at large. The FCC should be encouraging our internet service providers to actually improve their networks. The US is quite possibly the worst developed nation for internet. There are third world countries with better internet infrastructures. Instead of encouraging something to be done about this, the FCC is giving ISP's a new way to make more money, hand over fist, in what is already essentially a monopoly. It is ludicrous that the only way to get decent internet is to have a local municipality that provides it and even more ludicrous the number of places that outlaw that option. The fact that internet is not regulated as a public utility is a shame on the FCC and the US Government as a whole. Open internet is the backbone of many companies and the internet as a whole. The path that the FCC is choosing to take seriously disturbs me and causes me to lose all faith in the US Government's ability to protect the people it is supposed to represent. This proposed plan is going to stifle new business at best. At worst, it's going to ensure the internet is run strictly by large corporate entities. It's amazing to me how these horrible ideas were even considered. This is blatantly anti-consumer and blatantly anti-innovation.

In my opinion, the Internet should remain open, without allowing ISPs to charge a premium to content providers for faster bandwidth. The proposed changes will unfairly create a bias for large companies and serve to prevent innovation by smaller companies.

In addition, I believe a field such as telemedicine will greatly suffer from the proposed rules. This field is rapidly growing, and the proposed rule changes could completely obliterate some of the new innovations that are occurring. Even worse, someone could be prevented from getting the critical care they require.

I ask that you immediately drop the proposed rule changes and look for ways to preserve the fairness of bandwidth access for everyone.

Subject: Net neutrality will only hurt customers with the current state of the Internet in the USA
Hello,

I'm writing to express my concern about the FCC's stance on Net Neutrality. As it currently stands, ISP providers are not allowed to have designated 'fast lanes' for paying customers because of FCC rulings. But if the FCC commission decides to remove the net neutrality rulings and allow ISP's to discriminate traffic, it will have ramifications, bad ramifications, on the entire US market, not just the paying customers.

Let me preface this by saying that I agree with your ruling in principle. If a company is providing a service, and the customer isn't happy, the customer should be able to take their business to a company that provides what they want. That's the idea behind capitalism and the free market, and it works.

However, the problem is ISP providers aren't a free market, it's a monopoly, and the problem is multi-faceted. Some of which I don't particularly blame on the ISP's, and others I do.

The parts I do blame on ISP's is the onslaught of lawsuits against startups:

<http://arstechnica.com/business/2014/04/one-big-reason-we-lack-internet-competition-starting-an-isp-is-really-hard/>

How is an ISP startup going to compete with large corporations that can blindly spend millions of dollars on lawsuits that have no standing whatsoever, and accomplishes nothing except hurting the competition?

Also, smaller ISP's are being bought out by the larger competitors. My local ISP provider, Insight BB, was bought out by Time Warner, and they provided service for the Northern Kentucky and Southern Ohio/Indiana area. I wouldn't particularly mind this if it weren't for the fact that ISP's refuse to upgrade their network.

Take a look at other developed countries in the world, they're offering much better service at a lower price than the ISP's in the US. Now, as for upgrading the network, I don't place the blame on ISP's. Upgrading the network is expensive, and it takes years upon years to make the profit back. That is a huge risk to take.

Nonetheless, when we have frivolous lawsuits, removal of competition, and shoddy service, you produce the perfect storm of Crony Capitalism.

If that isn't bad enough, now we're getting into the Net Neutrality issue. This is providing the perfect storm for Internet Content Providers to provide anti-competitive service.

Netflix is currently taking up 40%-50% of Internet traffic. Are ISP's going to start slowing down all Netflix traffic and create a "Netflix Package" that customers have to pay for? What about other smaller companies that stream videos like Vimeo? Are they going to be slowed down? How do we know that people are going to continue visiting these sites if they are slowed to a crawl? How do we know that people are going to be willing to pay for these "packages"? How do we know that businesses can continue running if people stop visiting because their ISP slowed them down? How do we know that businesses won't start paying ISP's to deliberately start slowing down traffic to competition? What impact will the Internet "fast lane" have on the economy as a whole?

Please, the stakes are too high to change the current rules for Net Neutrality. The entire backbone of the Internet is relying on the select few ISP's the USA has, and if we allow them to start discriminating traffic, it will only mean more money in their pockets and a huge potential to damage everyone else.

With that said, I do agree that Net Neutrality should be removed and allow the competition sort it out. But as I just outlined, that will not happen. So here is my proposal to pave the way to a better Internet:

1. Keep the current Net Neutrality rules for the reasons I just explained, FOR NOW.
2. Place the responsibility of upgrading the network on towns, cities, counties, and states. It removes the risk of the ISP spending an enormous amount of money with no return, and allows the people to decide whether they want to spend the money on a better infrastructure for Internet service.

3. Convince Congress that they need to pass laws preventing ISP's from engaging in anti-competitive behavior that prevents small ISP startups from succeeding, or from simply being bought out.

Then, when all the ISP has to worry about is sending a piece of equipment to their customer, and when they know that it's much easier for other people to create their own ISP startup, and there is nothing that they can do about it, then you can be guaranteed the quality of service will be increased dramatically. After that, you can remove essentially all FCC rules that regulate the Internet without worry of what would happen to the Internet as a whole.

Please consider this email and please reconsider your current stance on Net Neutrality.

Thank you.

Sincerely,
Chris Trenkamp

Mr. Wheeler:

I am sure I am one in a long line of internet users that are blasting you with emails about the FCC's proposed changes for net neutrality. I won't besiege you with facts and memes about what this ruling means to the millions of people that use the Net. I will only comment on your statement that your proposal does not authorize "Fast Lanes" for companies. However, not making a ruling against this sort of practice leaves it up to the will of the market. And those with the money to impose their view of what the market will be will prevail. Please give the people a chance in the fight against groups, companies, and organization who only want to increase their bottom line.

Thanks

Commissioners,

I am in favor of reclassifying the Internet as a utility. The net should remain free of special interest. Fast lanes endanger the freedom and equality the internet has given society. Consumers should choose what to visit, not ISP or other corporations by playing favorites. Our democracy is already tainted by money, the internet is the last free space, where money, or lack thereof, is treated the same.

I am emailing to voice my opinion that the internet should remain open and ever free. Allowing ISP's to impose fees to edge service providers like Netflix and Amazon, will most certainly hurts small business and the consumer. Small business will not be able to compete with deep pocketed big rivals, and in the end consumers will pay ISP's twice: first for their internet service; second time through the edge service provider when they raise their rates to compensate for having to pay the ISP's for fast lanes.

The FCC has repeatedly allowed providers to hinder its potential growth.

The providers are happy keeping

An open internet and increase in bandwidth will create an economic engine for the future.

The internet is a public utility and must remain open.

Subject: Net Neutrality

I'm disappointed to learn that the FCC has voted to move forward with new Net neutrality rules that would allow pay-for-priority "internet fast lanes."

As someone who lives in a rural area, I've come to depend on the internet for many things: information and entertainment, banking and shopping, communicating with friends and family. If ISPs could choose, for their own benefit, to limit my access to these things, it could have a significant effect on my day-to-day life.

I've also created websites myself in the past, and hope to do so again in the future, and I certainly could be harmed in those efforts if ISPs were allowed to pick and choose which sites to favor. Both those who create websites and online services, and those who use them, need true Net neutrality.

The internet needs to remain a level playing field, where access and opportunity are available to everyone equally.

I'm a scientist, and the backbone of anything I do is based on information exchange and availability, so I'm online constantly. I am not teaching presently, but its a tool that's broadly used in the classroom - that I've used effectively in the classroom myself. We who post material on the internet for sharing, learning, and teaching cannot afford to pay some telecom fatcat - no BRIBE one - to make sure the information we are sharing freely (or not) doesn't take 10 minutes to load or isn't pushed down to #1150 on the list of hits. Telecom is only supporting the roadways on which that information travels. they didn't invent it, and they don't own it. Moreover, they already charge us as much as an arm and leg to get on it; I don't think it's reasonable or fair to allow them to add a speed tax to that. In this day and age, the internet really should be a public utility. We depend on fast, reliable, unbiased access to the net just like we depend on electricity and water.

Subject: COMCAST AND NET NEUTRALITY

Dear Mr. Wheeler,

I am appalled by the fact the FCC is even considering modifying net neutrality rules. There is no way this can be done without harming consumers. Consumers will either pay for services that are free now or pay increased costs for services they're already subscribed to along with the frustration it will cause by slowing other sites. Comcast already practically extorts money from it's customers with their package deal schemes. My internet and bottom of the line television costs me as much or more than electricity and my apartment is all electric. To get the three channels I would like to have it would cost me twenty more dollars a month and after a year it would jump another thirty. Half of the channels I have now I don't want. The only competition they have are the two satellite companies which are virtually the same. I personally cannot use either one because my landlord doesn't allow satellite dishes. For me there is only one choice. I called about just getting internet and not having television at all and my bill would still be the same. They would argue this is a great deal but in fact what they've done with their package schemes is eliminate an affordable basic television or internet option. The fact that they want spend billions to acquire Time Warner is proof that they have the resources to improve the infrastructure of their current business and lower costs for their existing customers. This also shows that they feel no obligation to provide the good services at competitive prices for people of all income ranges. Why should they? There is little to in my case no competition. The only alternative is to play the package schemes back and forth if you can afford it. Even their customer service proves how little concern they have for their customers. I recently moved and they gave me a self installation kit. I hooked it up and it didn't work. After countless calls and hours on the phone waiting to talk to a person and then disconnecting and reconnecting cables I was told I needed to take the box back and get another one. There nearest office is ten miles away since they closed all the local offices. This process repeated three more times until they finally sent a technician. He immediately told me I had the wrong box and swapped it out. But, he couldn't take back the extra one which made a fifth trip. For the 100 miles and 2 1/2 hours driving, not having service for a week and 4 or five hours on the phone hooking up and unhooking wire and waiting for reboots they gave me a $20 credit. At 50 cents a mile operating costs that's $50 just in vehicle expense. With this incredible disregard for the public that supports their business how can they be trusted to fairly distribute net speeds? This would just be another thing for them to charge a fee for. This is clearly bad and unfair to the general public. I would like to know if you or the commission are or can do anything to protect the public from this situation getting worse. If not please tell me who can.

Yours truly

Subject: Please keep the internet open

I must comment on this as my duty as a citizen of this country and as a person who has had the internet be the reason I've gotten a job in the past.

The internet is a tool, one that is becoming increasingly necessary in everyday life, and I see it every day. I've had customers that come into my shop, to get internet, because without it, they wouldn't be able to even apply for a job.

Now let's say, hypothetically, that I live in a Time Warner cable area, and that's all I can get, but I am trying to apply for a job with Verizon. Without any regulations in place, what's to stop Time Warner from slowing down my connection to Verizon, maybe in such a way that I don't get my critical response email for an hour or two AFTER they've closed my response window?

By allowing fast lanes, you are allowing a mess that could potentially take our open internet and turn it into a cable service, one where I have to buy packages for the sites and services I want at prices that I doubt the majority of the US populace could afford. If that comes to pass, may God have mercy on your souls for what may happen from the people that lose jobs, have their livelihoods crushed, and in general the entire destabilization of the sharing of information.

If the internet is not kept open and neutral then you will simply be infringing on the freedom of the American public.

Freedom is not allowing a few people and corporations to make more money, freedom is giving the public a better chance at improving their lives.

Thank you for your time,

The future of the open Internet is in your hands. And yet the Commission has proposed rules that would actually break it.

The proposed path would open the door to widespread discrimination online. It would give Internet service providers the green light to implement pay-for-priority schemes that would be a disaster for startups, nonprofits and everyday Internet users who cannot afford these unnecessary tolls. The Commission's proposal will effectively limit Free Speech because those that cannot afford the "fast lane" pricing will have unequal access compared to those that can afford to pay for higher network priority. This is unacceptable. I am appalled that this proposal even made it this far.

I urge you to scrap these proposed rules and instead restore the principle of online nondiscrimination by reclassifying Incumbent Local Exchange Carriers and Cable companies as "common carriers".

I fail to see how you came to the conclusion that allowing ISP's such as Comcast to set up barriers on the internet is an acceptable thing. Why should a service such as Netflix be required to pay their ISP and then have to again pay Comcast? Wouldn't it make more sense that their ISP be the one responsible for negotiating with Comcast? Look at the blogs posted by Level 3 Communications, It shows that Comcast has deliberately allowed congestion in order to force Netflix into a payment. It seems very clear that Comcast (WHO OWNS NBC) wants to shut out their competition by charging them for upgrades that should have been paid for from subscriber revenues years ago.

The merger between Comcast and Time Warner should not be allowed to happen. Comcast should be forced to split their provider branch from their content production branch. It seems that they have too much stake in the viewing of NBC shows to truly look at what is best for their consumers. Their ownership of NBC is a conflict of interest, they want Streaming services to fail to force customers to watch more TV.

Dear Mr. Chairman, Mr. & Ms. Commissioner,

Concerning your recent actions in an effort to provide the American people with an "open internet":

There is only one viable method within the current legal framework to ensure a truly open internet (and an internet available to all/most), and that's to reclassify broadband as a basic public utility, and to regulate it accordingly.

There is no reasonable argument that can be made to say that broadband is any less deserving of this classification than land line telephone service (which I don't even use any more)

Any other "solution" to the problem will simply provide more power to the cable oligopolies to gouge the American people for sub standard internet connections which are the laughing stock of the developed world.

Setting up guidelines based on what is and isn't "commercially unreasonable" is ridiculous. Even an Econ 1 student can see that these companies don't operate within a "fair marketplace" that lead to reasonable competition. "Commercially Reasonable" with the status quo is Monopolistic, plain and simple. Unless you live in a VERY small number of urban municipalities, you have a choice of exactly 1.

I hope that you'll do the right thing in this regard and do away with all efforts to allow such mechanisms as the "fast lane".

That route only leads to a diminished internet and a diminished America.

Respectfully yours,

Andrew Glendening

Chairman Tom Wheeler

Dear Chairman Wheeler,

As an Illinois consumer who depends on a fast, affordable web connection, I am concerned that a free and open Internet is now in grave danger.

I have become aware that the Federal Communications Commission is recommending so-called "fast lane" rules be adopted in this country, allowing service providers to artificially affect US citizens' internet searches, browsing and overall use by speeding up the transmission of certain payers' content, as well as prioritizing the ordered listing of websites/http addresses of those companies, organizations and entities who will pay for said artificial privileges.

Many laws and de jure rules in our society grant unfair advantages to those with the most money to spend. To give even more advantage, such as the effective commercialization of what has been the free and open speech since the inception of the world wide web, amounts to effective discrimination.

That violates the spirit of "net neutrality."

Please, stand up for consumers, protect net neutrality, and fight for the free and open Internet.

Subject: The internet is a public utility

To Chairman Tom Wheeler and the FCC Commissioners——

The internet is central to American life and the modern economy. It makes no sense to regulate it as a private "service." It is a public utility and should be treated as such.

Please declare the internet to be a public utility

To Chairman Tom Wheeler and the FCC Commissioners——

FCC—

The 21st century internet is an integral part of our economy, democracy, and communication systems. America is absolutely dependent on an open internet operating on net neutrality principles.

As such, you have an obligation to regulate it as a utility. Please assert your Title II authority, and stop trying to appease the telecom giants at the expense of everyone else.

Thank you,

To Chairman Tom Wheeler and the FCC Commissioners—

To the FCC—

Please build any net neutrality argument upon solid legal standing. Specifically, this means reclassifying broadband under Title II of the Telecommunications Act of 1934.

706 authority from the Telecommunications Act has been repeatedly struck down in court after legal challenges by telecom companies. Take the appropriate steps to prevent this from happening again.

Subject: traffic prioritization (Protecting and Promoting the Open Internet)

The de facto result of allowing traffic prioritization by ISPs will be the slowing of other network traffic to a standstill. The proposed rules the FCC has put forward are a death sentence for innovation in the United States. I would urge all of you to actually consider the situation on the ground in the US and simply classify internet as a utility. Anything else will result in irreparable damage to business and innovation in this country. Already Americans pay several times what residents of many countries in Asia and Europe pay. This will place a burden on both ends of the internet pipeline, and result in a massive loss of new businesses in the US. Companies that are able to do so will opt to operate elsewhere, reducing competition and leading to even greater monopolies.

There is NO rational justification for this move, just corporate greed. Recent revelations by Level 3 on how AT&T and Verizon, among other large ISPs, have refused to improve connections that would relieve known Internet bottlenecks lends credence to the fear that giving them any ability to grant 'preferential' treatment would open the door to their ultimate desire, complete commercialization (and its attendant politicization) of what has been a boon to the FREE exchange of information and personal views the Internet has provided.

I'm writing to encourage you to reclassify internet service providers as Title II common carriers. It's important that the internet stay a level playing field for all content, regardless of origin.

I believe the Internet needs to stay free, open, and neutral so that the people who use it can still have all the access that they need. People without jobs need it for applying, people who do have jobs need it to do business, students need it for research, scientists and other researchers need it for research! If the internet is shut down or owned by one nation or business, then many people will suffer the consequences.

The internet is a crucial means of communication, information, education, retail source (especially for those of us who live more rurally), and means of expression, among other benefits. To allow the big corporations more control would greatly imbalance the use. As someone who does live rurally, internet speed has been a problem in the past and we are only recently able to access the internet at reasonable speeds. The internet has replaced the telephone in so many ways for communication. It's an integral infrastructure depended upon by the PEOPLE and businesses of the world. Why let a few corporation turn it into their own private money-making monopoly? Who wants to be in the Slow Lane for their communications. Going back to the telephone analogy, it would be like going back to the days of 'party' telephone lines where you have to wait for your turn to place a telephone call. It's a public service/utility which deserves protection and equal access for all.

Dear FCC Leadership,

Hope all is well in the realm of federal communications. I am writing in concern to the current proposal to allow companies to limit internet capabilities. This proposal will open a door for new corporate tactics that undermine internet users in the name of profits. This proposal can only benefit a small minority of corporate interests while the majority of folks are completely unaware and unknowing of its future implications. If it doesn't benefit the individual it cannot benefit the people as a whole.

I encourage you to please use your regulatory powers to protect individual freedom in the use of the internet and to limit powers of companies to safeguard it from abuse. Thank you for using your best judgement in your decision and taking into consideration the benefits of the people as a whole rather than the interests of the few.

To Chairman Tom Wheeler and the FCC Commissioners——

To the FCC——

Please build any net neutrality argument upon solid legal standing. Specifically, this means reclassifying broadband under Title II of the Telecommunications Act of 1934.

706 authority from the Telecommunications Act has been repeatedly struck down in court after legal challenges by telecom companies. Take the appropriate steps to prevent this from happening again.

Sincerely,

Laurie Kirk

This message is to beg the FCC to turn aside the pleas from the internet providers, i.e., Comcast, AT&T, Time Warner and whoever else may be soliciting for unfair advantage in deciding who can or cannot have fast internet.

The internet should continue to maintain net neutrality and be open to all. Corporations should not be able to decide who gets to see what/when.

It is unthinkable to allow telecommunication corporations to decide the fate of the rest of the billions of Internet users. It would send our progress as a nation in the global marketplace to ruin. It would eliminate opportunities for those who are already stricken by poverty and racial inequalities.

Not only would it be a catastrophe for the US, it will also open up the door for more major corporations to have more economic and political control than the government itself.

If Comcast & AT& T think this will gain them profits, then they haven't considered the whole picture. The average family living in America can just barely get by. If rates are raised too much and too fast, the big corporations must remember one important detail about the consumer of their product: we will choose to eat before we choose to have a faster Internet.

It is absolutely unconscionable to think of giving any kind of control over the internet to any corporation, or the government. It goes against the principles this country was based on.

The fact that this is even up for a vote makes me and my friends really begin to mistrust the impartiality of the government.

Please vote for Internet freedom! Let the corporations fend for themselves in a democratic marketplace.

Net Neutrality is what makes the internet important that every person regardless of personal wealth is treated the same. Should that change that will destroy the value of the internet that will be limited only to those that can afford to pay extra. In that case I as disabled Vietnam Vet will have to quit the net.

The decision to kill Net Neutrality eliminates the ability for millions of people and small businesses to utilize the internet effectively. It will also eliminate any competition in the marketplace to improve the quality of internet service. It is an evil power play and will deal a crippling blow to the majority of people in this country.

Net Neutrality is required for free speech, guaranteed by the First Amendment of the Constitution. Nations ruled by dictators, oliarchs, and terrorist control speech and information flow.

To remove the freedom information is to destroy our great Republic.

Please vote against this. Please make sure that this does not happen.

We need to keep the internet as it is now and not allow companies to ruin the whole system thru corporate greed... they are only looking to make millions in profit and block those that depend on it for communications. Communications should be freedom of choice and remain as it is now . Companies like ATT and Comcast will dictate instead of allowing this freedom of choice. We have enough corporations running things in America now and they have totally mucked up the waters. We have enough hierarchy in this country now.

Your favor has been bought by corruption run rampant.

Any measure restricting Freedom of Speech or the elimination of Speech against government control is a abomination to the spirit and beauty of Freedom and Liberty that the US constitution guarantees.

Stop being criminals Stop selling out. Your eternal souls will pay the price for selling out for temporary worldly gain or comfort for a mere mortal lifetime.

The Internet has the potential to change the world for the better. From the vast amount of information made easily available to the simple connectivity that it allows, the Internet is a tool that promotes equality, and in order to maintain this we must support equality online. By giving corporations the power to charge companies and bottleneck service, you are giving entities the power to censor and interfere with the equality of the Internet. As a country, we have condemned other nations that have implemented online censorship policies, and yet we are contemplating giving this same level of control to self interested corporations. If we want to preserve equality and freedom in the US, we should continue to support and enforce net neutrality. Thank you for your time.

In this day and age, the majority of the masses of America work in industries that rely greatly on fast, efficient internet access. I personally require 100% total access to the entire internet at all times in order to professionally perform daily tasks in the medical and legal fields. Being slowed down or blocked, or even worse, being discriminatorily priced-gouged, would be egregiously disruptive to production and high efficiency levels and impact medical care and the legal process. We implore you to PLEASE do the right thing with a clearly justified decision on behalf of ALL, and not just a monopolized, oppressive, and controlling corporate few, by maintaining communication equality for ALL with "internet neutrality."

The Internet needs to remain free and open to all users, especially the small businesses who won't be able to afford the extra fees that big telecommunications companies would charge for using an Internet "fast lane." Lots of Internet and tech startups have also said that they could never have gotten started if they'd had to pay extra fees for a "fast lane."

Please keep the Internet free and open to all users, and reject any proposal that would let telecom companies decide who succeeds and who doesn't!

Net Neutrality is essential to the well-being of the country and to our complete stance in the world. Continuing the support of big business at the expense of the rest of us will be our downfall.

Allowing internet service providers to create internet “fast lanes” and “slow lanes” would do nothing more than allow them to extort payments from companies like Netflix. It’s time to admit that the internet is a public utility, not a private “service.”

Dear Sir or Madam:

As a citizen, licensed attorney, and internet user of nearly 20 years, there is little that I feel more strongly about at this time in our country than the need to maintain net neutrality. I will assume that you've listened to all the viewpoints for and against by now, so I will simply say that I intend to vote against anyone who is not opposed to a small number of large telecom companies who wish to stifle competition and create an arguably exclusive internet fast lane. Consumers are already being squeezed for the lackluster speeds and options we have today, and I see nothing but the end of the internet and it's cultural revolution as we know it should net neutrality fail.

Thank you for your time.

Sincerely,
Jason Norris

Subject: The recent FCC decision on Net Neutrality

I am extremely disappointed in the FCC ruling to move forward with its proposed plan to allow "Fast Lanes" on the Internet. Giving ISPs the power to control which sites get better service only further cements the current near-monopoly these companies have. Furthermore, it stifles innovation by smaller start-ups which likely could not afford the "tolls" that this plan would allow ISPs to enact to ensure that they would get the same service as large companies such as Google or Netflix.

In addition, the ISPs claims that this additional revenue is "necessary" to make the required network and infrastructure upgrades holds no weight when you look at the profits that these companies have brought in. Billions and billions of dollars a year, and yet they "can't afford" to upgrade their networks?

The current regulations on starting up a new ISP, too, make for a particularly anti-competitive marketplace in the United States. Twenty states currently have limits on municipal broadband projects, further driving down competition.

Clearly, the market is tilted in favor is the ISPs, not consumers. There is very little choice of provider, the prices for the service you CAN get has been steadily increasing, while customer satisfaction with these companies has consistently ranked at the bottom year after year. Yet, the FCC seems to think that giving companies like Verizon, AT&T, and Comcast even MORE power to shape the Internet is a good idea.

I urge the FCC to reconsider this course of action. Were it not for the open and neutral nature of the Internet, we would not have nearly the level of innovation and creativity that we have today. Allowing ISPs to decide what content gets good service and what content gets bad service effectively gives them the power to decide on the future of the spread of ideas and information.

Subject: We can't treat the internet as a service anymore

To Chairman Tom Wheeler and the FCC Commissioners——

The internet is a cornerstone of modern life -- from our day-to-day live to businesses and jobs. We simply can't live without it, so it's time to declare that it is a public utility, not a private "service."

The internet needs to be open, transparent, non-censured and neutral to allow free communications around the world.

Please keep the internet has a level playing field so that everyone has an equal opportunity. Many Internet innovations have started out as independent sites who attracted an audience and grew. Regulating Internet bandwidth will put innovators at a disadvantage.

The proposed Comcast-TWC merger must be forbidden! If it isn't, billionaire money-worshippers knowingly will deprive disadvantaged, disabled intellectuals of the electronic resources essential to a rewarding existence for low-income geniuses seeking education.

If the merger cited is allowed, consumer costs for television and internet service shall rise quickly indefinitely and quality of both service and content inevitably decline indefinitely.

Television service is astronomically expensive now, considering that 98% of television programming is garbage. Congress must mandate both radically reduced customer fees for television service and scientifically educational content. The wealthy should be forbidden all influence over content, both internet and television.

Degree of internet access and content quality inevitably shall be made by anti-intellectuals to depend on subscribers' individual wealth if any merger such as that cited above is allowed by the Fed.

Tom,

I'm sure you are a great guy, fun to hang out with, a good friend...

But you work for an organization that is directly benefiting from making this decision. You need to stand up for what you believe is right and protect free speech via the internet. I plan to start a company, but I don't have the money to pay Comcast, Verizon, AT&T, Bright-house, Cox Communications, et al. so that my content will stream the last mile. People may want to access my company's website, but it will unfortunately take 12 minutes to load the homepage because I refuse to pay off any of these providers, despite the users already paying them for access to the "internet". Internet IS a utility and should be classified as such. There needs to be a right-of-way requirement so every home has a choice of different providers even if there is only a single physical line running to the property.

Sincerely,
Matthew Moschel

I think you need an address to make this a legitimate complaint:
2410 W Azeele St
Tampa, FL 33609

PS: I only have access to a single internet provider (Brighthouse) and they charge 2 arms and a leg ($56 per month) for their slowest internet package without cable. My condo has been build since 2001 so clearly they are not "investing" $56 per month to maintain that line, and the kicker is they could increase my speed at the push of a button with no work required.

FCC Members:
The internet has always remained a place accessible to everyone and it needs to stay that way. Everyone should be able to access the information they need and allowing companies to control internet speeds leads to the censorship of necessary information. Censorship never ends well and should be prevented at all costs.

If you take that away you shut down access for millions of people to gain knowledge and make our world a better place. This free tool that has helped advance and better humanity shouldn't be given away to big corporations to sell. Not everything needs to be sold. Please don't allow this to happen.

Hello,
It shocks me to hear that the proposal of such a bill has come up. I completely oppose this bill, it would be taking away our freedom. For some people, like homeless, Internet is all They have to connect with the world. I use the Internet as my primary source of information and to connect with my friends all over the country. This monopoly they are attempting to create is unjust and I hope to hear soon that it will not come to be. Lets not restrict our freedoms even more than they have been. I wish I could say more but I'm not very informed on the matter and I'm not even sure where this message is going but I hope it helps one way or another.

To Chairman Tom Wheeler and the FCC Commissioners—

FCC—

The 21st century internet is an integral part of our economy, democracy, and communication systems. America is absolutely dependent on an open internet operating on net neutrality principles.

As such, you have an obligation to regulate it as a utility. Please assert your Title II authority, and stop trying to appease the telecom giants at the expense of everyone else.

My primary concern is that certain entities who are willing to pay higher fees will receive preferential treatment in terms of how fast their content can be downloaded. American taxpayers, like me, paid for the Internet's development, and I want to be able to access any content I want as quickly as I want without the content provider having to pay a higher cost for faster downloading—higher costs that will be transferred to consumers, as is usually done. I'm having a hard enough time paying my bills.

The internet should be a free and open place where all sites are entitled to equal exposure and run time. The effort to minimize or squash smaller informational highways poses a threat to the people's right to have freedom of information. The proposal against net neutrality must be denied. This proposal is a clear move by big telecom companies to promote limited informational exchange, and increasing informational reception from fewer major companies. This is a threat to information access proposed by big companies who seek to dominate the market of information by slowing down or blocking out competition.

To Chairman Tom Wheeler and the FCC Commissioners——

The internet is a cornerstone of modern life -- from our day-to-day live to businesses and jobs. We simply can't live without it, so it's time to declare that it is a public utility, not a private "service."

We find the corporatizing of America and the world terrifying and unethical vis a vis democratic and republican government ethos. Already, mega capitalism and mega corporatism control way way too much of our national debate via media and money to election and lobbying campaigns. The very health of our planet is at stake, and this profound and complicated matter gets way to little press. The online media is the only way to gather in depth info, really. Although there is plenty of misinformation and silliness online posing as in depth insider information, we are better off withoutr mega corporate impact on media INCREASING. Behind the scenes. FCC!!! we need this process to be transparent!! we need our media prot ected, wide ranging, and open.

Dear FCC,

Let us be adults and cut to the chase. The decision to end Net Neutrality is based on greed. The FCC's job is to protect every American citizen's rights, today the FCC has failed miserably. Providing extra income for corporations at the expense of all Americans is what you have accomplished today. Today, the FCC lacked the integrity to perform it's duty.

I sincerely hope that the FCC will reacquaint itself with the Bill of Rights, maturity and integrity.

An open internet makes for a healthy democracy.

Thank you,

It's simply not fair to allow companies to decide who gets to benefit from fast internet. it has become such a staple in the lives of many people, especially people of my generation, that slowing or shutting it down is not only unfair, but could be damaging to those that have built a reliance on it. Students do research for schools on it, and many people make their living working from home, or by posting videos on youtube. slowing or shutting down their internet could be detrimental to the lives of students and working adults alike.

Not only are people dependent on it for school and jobs, but social media sites like Tumblr, Facebook, and Twitter give socially challenged people a chance to interact with other people in a way they never could before. And the socially challenged aren't the only ones benefiting from internet. People, especially teens like myself, who find themselves fighting with anxiety, depression, or suicidal thoughts, find comfort, support, and perhaps most importantly, an escape in the world of social media and the internet. Selectively slowing or shutting down internet connection for the sake of a profit could mean depriving other teens of a chance to stop their internet friends from doing something they would regret.

The internet is too important to too many people to allow it to be taken over merely for the sake of greed. It's just not right.

The Internet was created to promote the free exchange of information. The loss if net neutrality jeopardizes that goal and threatens to undermine the positive impacts that the Internet has had on society.

I do not want to be stuck with a trashy dystopian Internet in which advertisements and vendor website load an order of magnitude faster than educational sites (ie wikipedia)!

The Internet has always been a level playing field for anyone to put out content, creativity, innovation and information.

It's the lifeline that allows small innovators to create a service that reaches almost everyone on the globe.

If the FCC passes these rules, huge companies could pay to make their websites faster and easier to use than all of their smaller competitors. The largest and richest broadband providers like Comcast and Verizon argue that they need more money to invest in new networks. But in reality, they are simply increasing profits by building up monopolies that just benefit their shareholders.

FCC Chief commissioner Tom Wheeler was originally quick to support an open Internet. But now, instead of following through with his promise, he's caving in to industry pressure.

Keep our Internet free and open. Reject a two-tiered internet.

I hope that one day soon, Internet providers will be re-regulated as common carriers. They have taken on that same, fundamental importance to the public.

Do not be swayed by business lobbyists on the slim promise to act in the public interest, or provide better service! The writing is on the wall - FCC must act in the interest of the public first, last, and always!

Please do not approve the proposal that will allow certain corporations to decide who can benefit from fast internet speed while slowing down or even blocking everyone else and making millions in profit from it. It would be one more huge and devastating blow that takes even more power away from the people into the hands of corporations. Please stop giving in to corporations and retain at least a minuscule amount of power.

To Chairman Tom Wheeler and the FCC Commissioners—

FCC—

The 21st century internet is an integral part of our economy, democracy, and communication systems. America is absolutely dependent on an open internet operating on net neutrality principles.

As such, you have an obligation to regulate it as a utility. Please assert your Title II authority, and stop trying to appease the telecom giants at the expense of everyone else.

Thank you,

Title II of the Communications Act of 1934 already grants you the authority to declare the internet a public utility and provide greater regulation to the telecommunications industry. It's long past time to declare the internet a utility.

Excessive consolidation of resources and power has resulted in a massive level of imbalance in this country, and the attempted corporate control of the internet is another fee and fine laden blow to those making use of the internet. This hostile take over should not be allowed. If you represent the interest of the people of this nation, who are demonstrably against the destruction of net neutrality, and not in the pocket of conglomerates that already possess far more than their share of wealth and power in the nation, then you will vote against the takeover of the internet. Please stand up for the people, do what you know is right. Please don't make another decision that will become another problem for the average citizen and make rich men richer. Do the right thing.

Uncontrolled, it will blossom and flourish. It, like our country, is producing great things. Please do not even consider trying to limit it or subject it to private enterprise. It is criminal this is even being considered. I can not image the populace of a free country accepting these controls.

The country today as we know it relies on the internet and the infrastructure it provides it's citizens. Without proper access to its information and the access to an open forum with which to share opinions and share free speech the people will lose even more respect for the way the government runs things. The United States Government can't get health care right, wars right, public policy right, international policy right, corporate policy right, at the very least they could back off and let the people have the only truly free forum of thought left since free speech is being persecuted more and more each day. The internet is no longer a commodity which needs to be regulated; it is a service that everyone needs full access to in order to function in today's society. Thank you for reading my message, and please protect net neutrality.

Subject: Reclassify internet as public utility, keep net neutrality
?This needs to be done rather than giving away the internet to a few big companies. The internet flourished as an open public venue for the free exchange of ideas. Big business has been trying to figure out how to undo that ever since. I worked in the industry, I saw this as it evolved.

Wouldn't it be wonderful if everyone had equal access to everything, including the internet? To open it up for a select few is not good decision making. Giving big companies more power and money making opportunities is not fair to the rest of us. Please keep equal access to the internet for all of us.

I'm writing to encourage you to reclassify internet service providers as Title II common carriers. It's important that the internet stay a level playing field for all content, regardless of origin. There is one internet, not a fast and a slow internet.

Subject: Internet NEEDs to remain open allowing priority access to any company for any reason is a step in the wrong direction. any company that resonates with the general public enough to use considerable bandwidth, should be allowed to use all they need, and for no reason should any company be throttled. This is a first step to corporate internet censorship. As it is, for the average american, we have little to no choice for internet service providers. I live near the heart of Austin, Texas, and despite having multiple providers, my zip code is only service by TWC and AT&T. Unfortunately AT&T does not offer what i would consider "high speed" internet, leaving TWC with a monopoly on high speed internet in my neighborhood. Without restoring net neutrality laws, this leaves me at the whim of TWC. They already cut my service in speed, with no reduction in cost. This idea that this company may have further control over my content is appalling. I already feel handcuffed to this company, and abolishing net neutrality essentially gives my ISP a hammer to smash my computer now that I am handcuffed to them. I pay for multiple services, including my access to the internet. Don't let these corporations limit what i get for my money.

To Chairman Tom Wheeler and the FCC Commissioners—

To the FCC—

Please build any net neutrality argument upon solid legal standing. Specifically, this means reclassifying broadband under Title II of the Telecommunications Act of 1934.

706 authority from the Telecommunications Act has been repeatedly struck down in court after legal challenges by telecom companies. Take the appropriate steps to prevent this from happening again.

Sincerely,

You need to stand up to these giant corporations who want to continue to profit off of consumers all while stifling innovation because it doesn't benefit them. Paid prioritization would destroy the Internet. The DC Circuit Court opinion made it clear that the only way to achieve net neutrality is to reclassify internet access as a telecommunications service. Reclassifying it as a telecommunications service is what the FCC should do regardless of political ramifications.

The 21st century internet is an integral part of our economy, democracy, and communication systems. America is absolutely dependent on an open internet operating on net neutrality principles.

As such, you have an obligation to regulate it as a utility. Please assert your Title II authority, and stop trying to appease the telecom giants at the expense of everyone else.

Technology is a challenge for everybody. We cannot limit nor set regulations for something we don't really know well and on doing so we are probably killing the ability of growing, evolving and maturing of the internet as we know today. Please, let us all participate, co-create something that is so bigger than everybody and allows us to be so much better than we were. Please don't let a bunch of corporations that don't want anything else but money and power speak for everybody else. Please...!

I may not be rich and may not understand how anyone could be so greedy in the name of prosperity but I hope the US communications regulator will leave fast internet free and open to anyone to use.
We rely on the internet for our small business and struggle everyday to make ends meet while working very long hours. We do not need another large corporation setting the rules for if we have fast internet or not. Please stop this proposal in full in its tracks!

Allowing internet service providers to create internet “fast lanes” and “slow lanes” would do nothing more than allow them to extort payments from companies like Netflix. It’s time to admit that the internet is a public utility, not a private “service.”

Subject: Reclassify American ISP's as Title II common carriers

The future of the open Internet is in your hands. And yet you have proposed rules that would actually break it.

Your proposed path would open the door to widespread discrimination online. It would give Internet service providers the green light to implement pay-for-priority schemes that would be a disaster for startups, nonprofits and everyday Internet users who cannot afford these unnecessary tolls.

I urge you to scrap these proposed rules and instead restore the principle of online nondiscrimination by reclassifying broadband as a telecommunications service.

Sincerely,

Chris Turpin

The internet is a resource that should be for the people who use it. It is already regulated like a utility but should not be throttled or slowed arbitrarily. It is important to keep the internet as an open platform that people from all walks of life can utilize equally and not better or worse based on income or status. Setting precedent with this bill will only further limit access to the wealth of knowledge found online. Do not set precedent for companies to gain wealth and limit access, it should be allowed that the internet is a free and open place to view content, share ideas, and learn about a multitude of subjects without filters and buffers. Keep the internet open and free.

As such, you have an obligation to regulate it as a utility. Please assert your Title II authority, and stop trying to appease the telecom giants at the expense of everyone else.

Net Neutrality is like free speech: not everything about it is perfect or completely desirable. But without it we lose A LOT.

Private companies should not get to decide who gets what free speech at what speed. If consumers use a lot of data let them pay for it. Please don't back down on Net Neutrality. The principle needs to be strengthened, not torn apart.

In the relentless search for profits, large corporations are once again trying to turn what is essentially 'The Commons' into something they can parcel up and sell. The internet providers should remain just that; utilities that simply deliver the internet, not gate keepers, nor toll booths, nor censors. Let them focus on competing with each other on speed and coverage and let there not be a monopoly.

As you know, you and the rest of the FCC approved a two-tiered plan that would allow ISPs to prioritize content. This plan is horrible and is not what Net Neutrality is all about. It is about a free and open internet where ISPs don't choose what content I can afford to see/use.

Please, re-think this proposal, and give back the money that corporations have manipulated the FCC with.

The greatest thing about the internet is the fact that you can access many different sources of information in order to find the truth. Throttling can only slow this down and could eventually lead to misinformation being the only information that we actually have access to based on what a few corporations want us to see. Don't turn the US into Big Brother. Don't support blocking or slowing down. I'm in support of these provider companies charging site to ensure that they never have any down time, but allowing the providers to speed or slow sites based on their own agendas is just wrong and takes away one of our freedoms.

I'm writing this on the same day as my entire San Diego county is on fire with news in the last 48 hours of something like 9 or more fires going all around. The suspense during this is incredible. One fire is just on the back 40 of my workplace, and that is just 3 miles from my house. Of course you can imagine we're glued to the computers and cell phones for updates on some of the major channels--Gmail/chat, Facebook, Twitter, and all that. This isn't just the stuff of fun and games that we need an open channel to move news and keep us connected. This is a California state of emergency right now. Lives and livelihoods are at stake.

This is what people use the internet for now. We can't have profiteering companies choke it according to their whim. Get it?

Mr. Wheeler ...

All Americans who see our way forward, know that protecting our Constitutional rights to unrestricted Freedom of Information is the foundation of our creative, productive culture in America. We all see the Internet as the information delivery system for now and into the future.

Corporations are NOT democratic institutions. Corporations are not human. Corporations stifle creativity and productivity by exerting control over available Information, thereby destroying real democracy.

The American Constitutional choice is obvious ... Open and available Internet for all citizens.

The internet has become essential to participatory democracy, and thus needs insulation from potential interference.

Subject: The internet is central to American life and the economy

To Chairman Tom Wheeler and the FCC Commissioners——

Allowing internet service providers to create internet “fast lanes” and “slow lanes” would do nothing more than allow them to extort payments from companies like Netflix. It’s time to admit that the internet is a public utility, not a private “service.”

Subject: ISPs need to be Title II Utilities

This email was not copied and pasted from a website, I spent a lot of time writing it, so please take the time to read it.

Hello, my name is Evan Burleigh and I am a constituent of the 8th District of Massachusetts represented by Stephen Lynch in Congress and I wanted to show my support for categorizing ISPs as Title II utilities under the Telecommunications act of 1996 as they provide telecommunication to their customers and make monopolistic deals with local governments like the Utility companies do. The law defines Telecommunications as "the transmission, between or among points specified by the user, of information of the user's choosing, without change in the form or content of the information as sent and received." [47 U.S.C.

<http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Title\_47\_of\_the\_United\_States\_Code> § 153(50)

<<http://www.law.cornell.edu/uscode/47/153.html#50>>] This sounds like an ISP to me, and to everyone I know.

Allowing for telecommunications monopolies such as Comcast, Time Warner, and Verizon to operate with no government oversight is dangerous. This is due to the fact that what is at stake here is access to their customers who, for the most part, have little to no choice in their local area for high-speed internet access. Allowing for an "Internet Fast Lane" where certain content providers such as Netflix and Pandora can pay for "faster" access to end-customers, will make it difficult to impossible for a Netflix competitor to start up and compete effectively due to the fact that they would not be able to afford to pay for "Fast Lane Access" to customers of a certain ISP, or eventually all ISPs, and therefore would have an increasingly difficult time competing on the Internet.

We have been lucky sofar that the internet has remained fair and open, but now that Telecommunication companies have established monopolies in most local areas, and are reaching market saturation, they are now looking to change the rules to take advantage of the fact that most of their end-user customers are stuck with them for high-speed internet, and therefore are forced to "tolerate" any changes in policy made by their ISP. This means no "choice" for these customers and therefore no free market. Due to this I believe there are two possible solutions.

First, prevent Telecommunication companies from signing exclusive deals with local governments allowing for more competition at the local level. This way, if an ISP started treating their internet traffic differently, another ISP has the option to start providing a "Net Neutral" service to local customers and try to compete. Unfortunately, right now the system is designed to prevent new ISPs from forming, which allows the big ISPs to simply grow market share with little need to market as most of the time they have no competition. This is a close to impossible solution as it has become clear that Telecommunication companies and the Telecommunications Lobby (CTIA) have bought their way into a federal agency and block any attempt to allow for local competition. It would also be a difficult solution to implement as you would have to deal with local agencies to change they way they work.

This brings us to the better solution, which is simply to utilize the Telecommunications act of 1996 to classify ISPs as Common carriers where the federal government simply regulates that they must operate by a set of rules that prohibit them from blocking or slowing certain content to their customers. This would allow them to continue to have monopolies making Wheeler and the CTIA happy, while also making the customers happy as they know that though they may have to pay through the nose for internet access due to a lack of local competition, they will at least have fair access to ALL of the internet, not just the websites and companies that can afford to pay extra for "Fast Lane" access.

Thank you for your time,
Evan Burleigh

Internet belongs to everyone and no entity, corporate or government, should control it in a way that favors one particular group over rest of the people. That is just unfair and irresponsible.

Do the right thing and let big companies know that people's access to Internet is not negotiable.

The proposal in front of the FCC would allow Comcast, AT&T and other big telecom companies to decide who can benefit from fast Internet speed -- while slowing down, or even blocking, everyone else -- and making millions in profit from it!

Please do not allow the internet to be a pay to play business. I've lived in developing countries where internet is only now slowly catching up with the rest of the world. I can't imagine the US passing a law that makes it a service based on greed and money. What a terrible example that will set. What a terrible process that will become. Don't do it. The world is so full of corporate greed already. We can't afford for the most equitable communication and knowledge resource to be monopolized by greed and profit. It's just not right.

As such, you have an obligation to regulate it as a utility. Please assert your Title II authority, and stop trying to appease the telecom giants at the expense of everyone else.

I am writing in support for Net Neutrality. In order to keep our world semi free at least in some countries all people need open access to all information. Information is power therefore to empower people to change, grow, invent and inspire they need free and open access to information. The best place for that is a free and open accessed internet.

Subject: Internet television
FCC

I'm a college student with basic cable (all I can afford), and that means that I can only get tv content from about a dozen different sources (the small group of media conglomerates that own all the major channels) and I have about fifty channels with one program on each - all of which are about 30% ads - on at any given time. With my basic internet access, which costs me literally nothing (as it's Google Fiber's free option), I can get content from countless sources ranging from those same giant media companies to little startups to other individuals with nothing more than a laptop and a Blogger account. All of the content is available all the time, and it's all equally accessible. If I want any content - information, entertainment, or otherwise, outside of that miniscule subset that a handful of major corporations want to sell me, to the internet I must go. Your current proposed rules for ending net neutrality would, if enacted, represent the first major step towards turning the internet into a new television where a handful of billionaires muscle out all other content providers and destroy the freedom and equality that are the whole value of the web. It's sickening to think that you would allow corporate lobbying - possibly the most purely evil and corrupt element of our political system - to convince you, the government of the people, to destroy the most free and democratic forum ever created and replace it with something controlled by a tiny minority of the wealthy and powerful. I recognize that leaving the internet free and open has downsides. Pornography and piracy are rampant and difficult to combat. I applaud the efforts of those who fight to uphold both the law and good moral standards within the current framework of the net, and I sympathize with their struggles. I cannot, however, condone the restriction of freedom, democracy, and equality in the name of more easily controlling these behaviors. Those who trade liberty for convenience deserve neither and will surely lose both. Don't turn the internet into television. Celebrate and protect this miraculous tool and help it to realize its truly American dream of bringing a voice and a home equally to all.

Allowing internet service providers to create internet “fast lanes” and “slow lanes” would do nothing more than allow them to extort payments from companies like Netflix. It’s time to admit that the internet is a public utility, not a private “service.”

Please classify broadband as a public utility. The internet is an active part in everyone's lives, its become a necessary tool in our modern society. Maintaining net neutrality will in the long run be more beneficial to society than these proposed fast lanes for the 1% (because that's what it comes down to). Take it from an economist, trickle down economics doesn't work and uplifting all members of society does and has greatly benefitted the economy.

To Chairman Tom Wheeler and the FCC Commissioners——

The modern economy would collapse without the internet and American life would be extraordinarily disrupted. It's a simple fact that the internet is a public utility, not a private service. It's time we regulated it as such.

The internet is a public utility, it is not a product or service that some greedy company can claim to have designed and built. It and access to it belong to everyone, everywhere, and it must remain neutral, not be taken over by corporate interests at the expense of other companies large and small, individuals, citizens, the community of people at large.

Preserve and protect an open and neutral internet usable equally by all.

I am very disappointed that the FCC ruled in favor for internet "Fast Lanes". The Service Providers in the US provide sub par speeds as compared to Europe. By allowing companies to pay for these fast lanes will divide the internet even further. Net Neutrality means having the internet be the same for everyone not the greedy service providers. When the service providers charge companies for these "Fast Lanes" will ultimately pass the cost onto the consumer. This is evident from the recent purchase of "Fast Lanes" by Netflix. Now customers will have to pay more for the service they already have.

I am also in favor of internet companies being formally classed as Type II Common Carriers. Please do not let profit hungry companies set the rules for which the citizens of the US will ultimately have to pay for.

Subject: The internet is a utility. Please treat it as such under the law.

Mr. Chairman:

These days the internet isn't a "nice to have" or a luxury. For our country to keep up with others around the globe, we must have internet access to conduct our business and for education. Sure watching movies is "okay" but more and more, shops are closing because of the competition offered by online stores. What will happen when internet is priced out of the reach of our poorest citizens? They will have yet another disadvantage in trying to compete with their more well funded peers.

We see the news. Our country is really run by the corporations right now. Who has the money is who gets what they want. If you back away from making the internet a common carrier, a level playing field for all, you will be vilified in history for short term political gain and contributions.

Our country's internet is poor when compared to Europe in Japan. Big telecom had pocketed money for "builds" that they never do and then say they need to charge the customer more. They make the customer pay for access and now want to make the companies pay for being able to deliver their content. That will make the content providers charge more.

So they are getting paid by EVERYONE and the consumer sees nothing but shoddy slow service unless they want to upgrade and pay more. My broadband bill, for cable only, is $66.95 a month. I can afford that. If my content providers start charging $30 to $60 a month, which they may have to do to pay for what they are getting charged by the internet providers, how is this fair to the consumer?

All costs, in the end, are taken out of the consumer. WE pay those bills. WE will float the additional costs for all services. And ultimately WE won't be able to afford it and it will hurt the economy.

I am required to have high speed internet access for my employment. It is a necessity. It is a necessity for many college and even high school students taking classes. This is not just an entertainment issue, this is something that is needed for our day to day lives.

This is a utility and needs to be regulated as such and not a cash cow for big telecom to just make billions on the backs of the American people.

Thank you.

If you really want to make the United States a second class internet entity, allowing access fees in the guise of fairness will do it. If the big guys need to make more money let them develop the internet technology for more efficient, faster, and cheaper ways of doing it. That is the American way, you have a problem - solve it, don't dump on your customers. If our country decides to slack off, someone will develop it and the money and political power will flow there instead of here.

Mr. Wheeler,

If you really want to make the United States a second class internet entity, allowing access fees in the guise of fairness will do it. If the big guys need to make more money let them develop the internet technology for more efficient, faster, and cheaper ways of doing it. That is the American way, you have a problem - solve it, don't dump on your customers. If our country decides to slack off, someone will develop it and the money and political power will flow there instead of here.

Decisions must begin to look not at the large imposing mass, but foster the human quality of connection, creativity, and individuality. Let business have their free-market. Let us have our internet. They do not have the right to control our connections and voices to one another. To throttle, or accelerate. Who are they to believe they can privatize our connections and profit from them? Who are you to let it happen? The internet is for people, not companies. Companies may participate, but they should not own us in yet another way. Stop.

Subject: Please don't kill net neutrality

Letting Internet Service Providers charge different rates for different customers might not be so terrible for consumers if not for two major problems.

1. ISPs are effectively monopolies. I have one and only one choice for internet where I live. My provider has no incentive to provide good service or charge me a reasonable rate. I don't live in a rural area either. I live in Kansas City, the largest Metropolitan area within 250 miles.

2. Conflicts of interest in all directions. Allowing Cable companies to provide internet is a HUGE conflict of interest. Streaming video on the internet has already made cable TV an obsolete technology. But in order to do it, I have to get service from my cable company. Cable companies have a strong incentive to limit internet bandwidth speeds and limit content available. They have done an excellent job of doing both of these things.

Allowing cable companies to limit bandwidth they don't like would be like letting a gas station own the street in front of your house. When you try to get gas from another gas station, lanes get shut down and traffic reduces to a crawl.

Stopping this won't fix our countries internet problems. You have a lot of work to do to create incentives for improvement and remove conflicts of interest. Stopping this will keep our internet problems from getting worse.

Stop making things worse. -joe

Subject: I am for net neutrality

I oppose the FCC's decision to allow my internet service provider (Century Link) to dedicate "internet fast lanes" to those companies that pay a premium for said services while passing these costs along to the consumer. I pay $110 a month for 12mbps internet speed with a dedicated domain for my small business website and frequently average an upload speed that exceeds my lazy download speed. I often only receive a fraction of the advertised speed that I pay over $1000 a year for. The FCC's proposal will slow my already abysmal internet speeds to a death crawl if I refuse to pay a premium charge you will attach to the services that I depend on most. The open nature of the internet in it's current state allows companies like Amazon and Netflix and Google to continue to innovate and offer products and services that consumers and business owners like me thrive on. The rewards for these groundbreaking and world changing ideas should be won on a level playing field, not one with the government casting stones at the companies with the biggest stick. It's crucial that the pot in which we all stick our hands doesn't burn us. If it does, the FCC will be responsible for hindering the progress and the unlimited potential that these companies have supplied all these years while contributing to making the web the most important invention in the history of mankind.

I'm sure that this (as with other emails to other agencies including The White House and members of Congress) will just be ignored or (maybe) just get a robo-email saying "thank you for contacting" while refusing to actually address the issue being raised. How can you people look yourselves in the mirror and call yourselves public servants?

That having been said,has the entire leadership completely lost their minds? To give pay to play service only to those who can afford it while not giving dependable internet to others is beyond sickening. This is just another "Citizens United" giveaway to the mega-corps. Has the ONE consumer protection agency over the media been so completely corrupted and bought off that they think this is even remotely a good idea?

It's bad enough that you have allowed all major news outlets to be owned by a mere 6 corporations which has lead to virtually NO independent journalism and all sensationalism. The ONLY truly independent sources have been on the internet and now you are giving the oligarchs virtually free rein to restrict content in any way, shape or form they desire while not suffering any consequences. You are LITERALLY squelching the voice of the people in favor of the uber-rich. Sad, sad, sad.

What is it going to take for you to actually take ACTION? Fox already admitted in OPEN COURT that they LIE and there's nothing "technically illegal" about it. If that is the case, then why are not in congress actively seeking a legislative solution to bring these people back into SOME kind of decency and ethics? I am so disgusted that, were the commissioners elected officials, I would be asking for impeachment proceedings.

I respectfully, though wholeheartedly disagree with the proposal. If ISPs can charge extra for greater access, this is not open. It cannot possibly be considered "open" if preferential treatment can be given while other customers can be shoved aside. Service providers like Comcast should not be allowed to extort customers and users and arguments that have been put forth in support for this sort of behavior is flawed at best and misleading at worst. Net neutrality, the principle that Internet service providers (ISPs) should treat all data that travels over their networks equally, is important to me because without it ISPs could have too much power to determine my Internet experience by providing better access to some services but not others.

A pay-Àto-play Internet worries me because new, innovative services that canâ€™t afford expensive fees for better service will be less likely to succeed.

An open, neutral Internet is important to me because, as a computer science student, I need to know that there won't be any barrier to entry if I come up with a new idea or service to put on the Internet. If ISPs make it so that some services are faster than others, there's no way I'd be able to compete.

Please reclassify broadband internet as a Title II Common Carrier Telecommunications Service.

Protecting net neutrality protects economic, intellectual and technological development by allowing alternatives to large corporate interests to remain competitive. Removing the ability for startups, small businesses and individuals to reach the same audience and share the same opportunities as big businesses, simply because they can't negotiate to pay for competitive speed and access, destroys the basic principles of American ingenuity that lead to the formation of these big businesses in the first place. If we are going to continue thriving as a country and developing as a society, it is paramount that the tools, ideas and conversation available through an open and neutrally-accessible internet service be protected at all cost. The unbiased connection of the American people to one another, and of our country to the rest of the world, is an unparalleled opportunity for growth and progress. Please do not let the economic interests of the few undermine the opportunity for prosperity and freedom that are the right of the many.

Please preserve net neutrality, and again, please reclassify broadband internet as a title II common carrier

Hello,

It saddens me that despite major public outcry that no action was taken to classify cable companies as common carriers, nor were fast lanes banned. This is in direct opposition to public opinion, in denying these changes you are effectively freezing time for our internet infrastructure. There is no competition in the marketplace for cable, you are effectively granting them free reign over whether or not to extort even more money with fast lanes by not explicitly banning them. The cable companies are a dying industry in comparison with our major tech sector they are old news. It's time to listen to the public and strongly consider reclassifying cable companies.

Subject: Planed "Net Neutrality" Rules

Hello Commissioners,

I am a systems and network administrator for a small telecom engineering company and I am protesting the currently proposed "Net Neutrality" rules. The way they are outlined it will give the major ISPs the ability to segregate traffic between fast lanes and slow lanes. This in my opinion and the opinion of many other Americans is wrong and should not be allowed.

But even though the people have crying out for a revision to these rules to remove this fast lane idea we have been ignored and this will not stand.

This idea of a fast lane would keep small start up from being able to compete with corporate giants who can afford to pay the ridiculous fees that ISPs will impose upon every company that doesn't belong to them.

Chairman Tom Wheeler has stated that there is a clause that would keep anti-competitive practices such as this from happening but has yet to present anything that defines what is and is not an anti-competitive practice.

If the currently proposed rules are put into place there will an extremely strong backlash from the American people and the IT industry.

The internet may of started out as a government sponsored project but has evolved far beyond that. It belongs to the people now and the people will not accept these rules as is. We will write our elected representatives, we will protest, we will do whatever it takes to keep the internet free and open for all people not just the ones that can afford it.

Subject: net neutrality/internet fast lanes - please BAN THEM

Folks,

I’ve been in the networking industry for 30 years with ATT, EDS, and HP. I know first-hand how the internet works, as well as the market pressures and impacts on it. If you do not explicitly rule against “fast lanes”, you are supporting them. You and I know that our current version of “free market” will take advantage of any loophole. If you allow (by not banning them) these “fast lanes”, you will effectively put the internet services bandwidth up for the highest bidder. This will put new services at risk of failing due to a lack of equal access to internet bandwidth. Looking back 20 years, most of our innovations and services we use today on the internet would likely have failed if access to bandwidth was impacted by a financially preferred model of performance/delivery. And you know I am not talking about local loop speeds....

Please do not allow internet bandwidth to be allocated to the folks with the most money. Keep the internet as an equal access path (for both users and service providers). I look forward to hearing of your change in direction from public feedback.

Regards,

Rich Myerly

Americans demand, and President Obama pledged, real net neutrality.

This requires:

- 1) FCC Chairman Tom Wheeler should resign or be removed from his position. The recent policy proposal from the FCC on net neutrality enables service providers to blackmail content providers with fees for the delivery of content that the subscriber already paid them for. Such a proposal is consistent with Wheeler's former role as head of National Cable Television Association but it is a violation of the chairman's responsibility to the public.
- 2) Internet service has become an essential tool for work, commerce, and the exercise of free speech. Broadband providers use public rights of way to string cable across the country and the space to do so is limited. Accordingly the government has an obligation to ensure that this natural monopoly is not abused.
- 3) Almost no households in America have a more than one provider of real (> 6 mpbs) broadband internet access. The FCC has done nothing to promote competition for this critical service.

4) Internet Service should be regulated as a "telecommunications service". The companies that operate the network must not be allowed to discriminate regarding the physical devices connected, or the type of traffic transmitted over the network. For almost all people, there is only one high speed 'pipe' available to them. The operator should be compensated fairly for operating the pipe infrastructure but they must not be permitted to control who and what can be access or to artificially affect the throughput; just as Ma Bell was obligated to connect people wanting long distance service from Sprint and other providers.

5) Any network services over and above the raw transmission of data through the network should be provided by third parties; without discrimination based on on content, source, or destination.

6) Broadband providers should be permitted to inspect traffic only for the purpose of routing it to it's intended destination and not otherwise, scan, store, forward or share it.

In short, Internet Access should be treated exactly the same way that phone service was; after the dismantling of the Bell monopoly.

Dear FCC,

I am writing to oppose rules that will allow for discrimination on the Internet - where the wealthy can purchase faster Internet service and everyone else continues to have slower service.

I do not want telecom giants and wealthy Internet companies to determine the future of the Internet. I want new ideas to flourish on the Internet and not be blocked because they do not have sufficient funds to purchase fast service and compete.

I do not want the Internet to be turned into another vehicle that allows money to flow from working Americans to the wealthiest -- where web-based services like Netflix purchase faster service and pass the costs on to consumers.

The proposal being considered would kill rather than protect Net Neutrality and allow rampant discrimination online. The Internet should be viewed as a public good and should be operated consistent with our rights to Freedom of Speech and Freedom of the Press. Turning the Internet into a pay to play scheme is unacceptable.

Subject: Your "Not Neutrality" Proposed Rulemaking

Dear FCC Rulemaking Committee,

Congratulations on giving the internet to Telecommunication companies and cable providers today! What a win for the same industry many of your FCC Commissioners and Chairmen come from. They will be so happy with your fealty to their continued digital dominance over the American people, who continue to pay more for less.

Who loses today? Innovation, progress, fairness, transparency, the American people, Silicon Valley startups, and anyone who doesn't have deep pockets.

I only have my voice, which says the following - cable companies, ISPs, and telco giants are ALL common carriers - and should be REGULATED as such. Your proposed rulemaking would create a SEPARATE AND UNEQUAL internet. Venture Capital money would flow OUT OF Silicon Valley - NOT INTO. Innovation would be asked the following question: does this compete with pre-existing titans of telco technology. If so, money would dry up. The nascent company would fold. Innovation and speech, shuttered.

The American people? Screw them. They already enjoy internet speeds that are laughably slow compared with other countries. Our POTS infrastructure and outdated COAX hodgepodge are frightfully last century and unreliable. But why encourage, through a level playing field, Telcos and ISPs to build up their infrastructure when you can simply demolish their competition with the stroke of a pen. This is what you've done with your proposed Net Neutrality (really, NOT NEUTRALITY) proposal.

I've CC'd my Senator in this missive. She will also be hearing from me directly via a phone call and letter. Today you managed to piss off the American people. Enjoy hearing from my brothers and sisters, and may their voices ring in your collective ears.

To start simply the internet needs to stay open. All channels need to be clear for communications. We have encountered a great centralization of information providers that exist in media and the airwaves. We have evolved in using the internet for news and peaceful collection of people and ideas. It is important that we do not let any entity have the right or capability to hamper any communications. I understand this service comes at a price, this needs to be figured out without giving up the public responsibility of free and unfettered speech. This may come as a minimum performance that is of high quality that must be delivered to all web traffic regardless of fast lane but mostly no packet shaping on who gets less.

Please reclassify ISPs as Common Carriers.

Businesses and individuals rely on the Internet being open and consistent across all services, websites, email, etc.

If ISPs are continued to be allowed to charge companies like Netflix to ensure speedy delivery then what are small businesses going to do when the ISPs charge them fees that only large companies like Netflix can pay? The end result will be the death of small businesses that would have helped foster healthy competition in the marketplace.

In addition the Comcast merger should be off the table. In the city I live in, which is near Los Angeles, the only option is Time Warner. The market already needs fixing without putting more fuel on the fire by allowing Comcast to merge with Time Warner. We should have more choices not less.

On top of all of these problems the fact that Time Warner, Comcast, and pretty much all of the ISPs are also content providers poses other problems related to consumer choices being limited and disrupted.

Do not continue to allow their lobbying power to overturn the power of a free market which contains healthy competition that is vital to overall economic prosperity.

Look at the qualities of today's ISPs, and compare them to other common carriers. Then realize they are all just common carriers and reenforce net neutrality. For the good of the human race, there needs to be some equality amongst people. Making the rich richer isn't a good thing for anyone except themselves. People are starving and hungry, and the people who run the largest corporations in the world do not help them. Giving them even more money out of the pockets of the less wealthy is wrong.

From Reuters: "Federal Communications Commission Chairman Tom Wheeler has come under fire from consumer advocates and technology companies for proposing to allow some "commercially reasonable" deals in which content companies could pay broadband providers to prioritize traffic on their networks."

I am writing vehemently oppose any rule that allows content companies to pay providers to prioritize their network traffic. I keep hearing that the FCC denies that this will result in a "fast lane/slow lane" scenario, but it seems perfectly obvious to me that it will. There will be absolutely nothing the FCC can do at that point that will prevent the internet from being divided into "haves" and "have nots." That's exactly what such a provision would be intended to do - allow companies (the "haves") to pay for faster speeds than the have nots. What's not clear about that? How are we supposed to be pacified by hollow assurances from Wheeler? This plan is not reasonable, commercially, politically or even ethically.

I support the plan to reclassify internet providers as utilities. That is very clearly what they are.

Thank you for your consideration.

Chairman Wheeler,

As a citizen of the United States, I am greatly distressed by the recent developments regarding Net Neutrality. As a citizen I feel it is my duty to inform you, a civil servant, that I do not approve of your proposition for changes to the federal governments stance on Net Neutrality. I would respectfully request that you, as your position indicates, listen to me and my fellow citizens as we oppose your stance. It is not your right to make these decisions as you see fit. It is your job to represent in law the wishes of the public, not to decide what the public's best interests are. It is a fine line, and I understand that you must sometimes be put into a position where what the public wants and what you want are at odds. I understand that, but I do not accept it as an excuse. You must put aside your personal beliefs when making such drastic changes as these. You do not represent yourself and your own interests, you must represent the american public and their interests. That means that you must be aware of what it is the american public wants. I understand that this can be difficult, but I hope that enough of the public has weighed in on this issue for you to realize that what the american public wants is total net neutrality.

Dear Commissioner,

The future of the open Internet is in your hands. And yet you have proposed rules that would actually break it.

Your proposed path would open the door to widespread discrimination online. It would give Internet service providers the green light to implement pay-for-priority schemes that would be a disaster for startups, nonprofits and everyday Internet users who cannot afford these unnecessary tolls.

I urge you to scrap these proposed rules and instead restore the principle of online nondiscrimination and reclassify broadband as a telecommunications service.

The ISP's warn that "such an action would greatly distort the future development of, and investment in, tomorrow's broadband networks and services."

What makes this last "threat" particularly hilarious is that ISPs have already started slowing down their investments in network upgrades even without being reclassified as telecom carriers.

Companies like Verizon and Comcast have, in recent history, been granted hundreds of millions of dollars to improve their service for their customers. Yet they choose to not follow through on their original contractual obligations, and instead of lobby to change the contract so they do not have to improve, invest in, nor develop "tomorrow's broadband networks and services." I find it unacceptable that tax payers dollars are continuously wasted on false promises of companies like Comcast and Verizon.

The large ISP's lobbying against net neutrality already do not provide the full product for which its customers currently pay. The injustice of throttling has become common practice for these large ISP's. A customer paying for 5 megabits-per-second routinely is serviced with speeds significantly slower. The only way a paying customer is able to fix this is if they call their ISP and are persistent enough to demand the full service for which they are already paying. This means that the ISP is capable of providing their full service yet chooses not to in the interest of profits.

I hope you place people above profits. If you allow these companies to continue to marginalize its paying customers, as well as tax payers who contracted them for better service which they fail to honor, the fair flow of information which has allowed our country to prosper will cease to exist. Consequently, the only party that will prosper is Comcast. Maybe that's what you want. I don't know how much money has been thrown your way by Comcast and Verizon. If you wish to serve money, then why don't you make like a tree, and get the fuck out of our government. You will destroy the prosperity of all Americans to serve the profits of Comcast.

Any decision that does not embrace and protect net neutrality in its entirety will erode the public's faith in the government of these United States of America to serve its citizens.

Please choose the respect of the public over padding corporate profits.

Sincerely,
A Concerned Citizen

Subject: Net Neutrality

Hello all, and especially you Tom Wheeler,

I am writing to express my intense displeasure with the new proposed rules the FCC is considering in regard to Internet Traffic and Net Neutrality. Currently the FCC (read: you) are considering rules that will demolish the fair and equal soap box that is the internet. By not barring communication companies from developing so-called "Fast Lane" tiered internet services, you are in fact inviting them to do just that. After all, these companies exist to make money, and the best way to make money is to figure out how to charge more for the same or less service, which is what the currently proposed rules all but ensure will happen.

In my opinion, the FCC should go a step further and ban data caps as well. After all, I am not charged more for cable television if I watch 100 hours of it in a month, why should I be charged extra for basically the same circumstance over the internet?

I know that Tom was a lobbyist for these mega-telecom companies, but I am asking you to put aside your personal desires and the no-doubt massive "gifts" promised to you by these companies. I am asking you to do something selfless. Something for the good of all people, not just the company whose Board of Directors you will be joining as payment for drafting and pushing forward these set of audacious rules. I am asking you to do the right thing.

Thank you all for your time,

Hello Mr. Chairman:

I am a student at Olympic College in Shelton WA, and am currently working on a research report concerning Internet Governance and Net Neutrality. I was wondering if you could answer a few questions for me.

As part of my research I have noticed that many people are concerned about the amount of information that will continue to be available to them on the internet if there are no neutrality rules.

At this time are there any rules that require providers to allow access to the internet to all users?

If the service providers are not required to give access to all users will there be limits to the amount of service that users will be allowed?

Also will this create a limit to the amount of information that will be available on the internet to users?

Is there a possibility that users will no longer have the ability to access information that is available to them now?

Many people in the United States are claiming that those who do not want net neutrality are basing those desires on greed. Do you agree with this or do you believe there is another motive?

Is it your belief that there is a way to create a set of rules that will satisfy users as well as providers?

I was also wondering if you could in your own words explain what a free and open internet is?

I do hope that you can find a moment to answer my questions. I realize you are a very busy person. However, I also believe that you are the one person who could potentially have answers worth listening to on this subject.

Thank you so much for your time and I would like to thank you in advance for your answers.

Dear Honorable Wheeler,

I'm writing this in the hopes that I can express my sincere hope that the Internet can remain the open and free bastion of innovation and thought that has so defined us as a society today.

When we look for ideas, when we want to express our thoughts and opinions, the Internet stands as today's benchmark, an indispensable tool; no other medium can come close in being able to freely and quickly exchange ideas, create new industries and foster our society intellectually and technologically. The Internet is the pillar to so many jobs of today and tomorrow.

Forsaking control to individual corporations, no matter how much oversight, perceived or not, would be disastrous and not only constrain that free-flow of thought, but damper us as a country, in my opinion, and move us from a technological innovator and leader to one that is handcuffed to the whims of shareholders of a few corporations.

Sincerely and respectfully yours,

Subject: Preserve Net Neutrality!
Hello,

In light of the recently rumored proposed rules around "net neutrality" by the FCC, something which would ultimately destroy real net neutrality, I feel compelled to voice my concerns. We cannot let internet access and traffic flow be controlled by deep-pocketed corporations to be enjoyed only by the wealthy, leaving small companies and users at a disadvantage when presenting, viewing or utilizing the internet for their livelihood. These proposed rules are an absolute step in the opposite direction from that and need to be tabled and forgotten forever, immediately. Americans demand, and President Obama pledged as part of his election campaign, real net neutrality.

This requires:

- 1) FCC Chairman Tom Wheeler should resign or be removed from his position. The recent policy proposal from the FCC on net neutrality enables service providers to blackmail content providers with fees for the delivery of content that the subscriber already paid them for. Such a proposal is consistent with Wheeler's former role as head of National Cable Television Association but it is a violation of the chairman's responsibility to the public.
- 2) Internet service has become an essential tool for work, commerce, and the exercise of free speech. Broadband providers use public rights of way to string cable across the country, much of it taxpayer funded, and the space to do so is limited. Accordingly the government has an obligation to ensure that this natural monopoly is not abused.
- 3) Almost no households in America have a more than one provider of real (> 6 mpbs) broadband internet access. The FCC has done nothing to promote competition for this critical service. Very real monopolies exist in nearly every segment of the marketplace on U.S. soil due to limitations placed on competition in the broadband arena. This is wrong.
- 4) Internet Service should be regulated as a "telecommunications service". The companies that operate the network must not be allowed to discriminate regarding the physical devices connected, or the type of traffic transmitted over the network. For almost all people, there is only one high speed 'pipe' available to them. The operator should be compensated fairly for operating the pipe infrastructure but they must not be permitted to control who and what can be access or to artificially affect the throughput; just as Ma Bell was obligated to connect people wanting long distance service from Sprint and other providers.
- 5) Any network services over and above the raw transmission of data through the network should be provided by third parties; without discrimination based on on content, source, or destination.
- 6) Broadband providers should be permitted to inspect traffic only for the purpose of routing it to it's intended destination and not otherwise, scan, store, forward or share it.

In short, Internet Access should be treated exactly the same way that phone service was; after the dismantling of the Bell monopoly. We need to protect and preserve real net neutrality and these would actually be steps in the right direction.

Thank you for your time,

Subject: It's time to regulate the internet as a public utility

To Chairman Tom Wheeler and the FCC Commissioners——

Title II of the Communications Act of 1934 already grants you the authority to declare the internet a public utility and provide greater regulation to the telecommunications industry. It's long past time to declare the internet a utility.

Please build any net neutrality argument upon solid legal standing. Specifically, this means reclassifying broadband under Title II of the Telecommunications Act of 1934.

706 authority from the Telecommunications Act has been repeatedly struck down in court after legal challenges by telecom companies. Take the appropriate steps to prevent this from happening again.

Hello,

Please consider that Comcast had a revenue of >65B dollars last year. The internet rules as they stand are very 'commercially reasonable' and the intent of this is to constrain yet another corner on their markets. Additionally Congress should take responsibilities for it's own mismanagement of the federal government and should stop looking for alternative revenue streams. Auctioning the spectrum will not solve the US debt issue.

To Chairman Tom Wheeler and the FCC Commissioners——

As a concerned citizen, I am writing to urge the Federal Communications Commission to protect Net neutrality and drop the proposed “pay-to-play” rule which would allow corporations and ISPs to implement paid prioritization.

The internet is essential to American business, innovation, and democracy. As such, Net neutrality principles must be protected. Please protect the open internet, scrap paid prioritization, and reclassify the internet as a telecommunications service to ensure Net neutrality.

Subject: Net Neutrality! Don't make a mistake, please.
Americans demand, and President Obama pledged, real net neutrality.

This requires:

1)FCC Chairman Tom Wheeler should resign or be removed from his position. The recent policy proposal from the FCC on net neutrality enables service providers to blackmail content providers with fees for the delivery of content that the subscriber already paid them for. Such a proposal is consistent with Wheeler's former role as head of National Cable Television Association but it is a violation of the chairman's responsibility to the public.

2) Internet service has become an essential tool for work, commerce, and the exercise of free speech. Broadband providers use public rights of way to string cable across the country and the space to do so is limited. Accordingly the government has an obligation to ensure that this natural monopoly is not abused.

3) Almost no households in America have a more than one provider of real (> 6 mpbs) broadband internet access. The FCC has done nothing to promote competition for this critical service.

4) Internet Service should be regulated as a "telecommunications service". The companies that operate the network must not be allowed to discriminate regarding the physical devices connected, or the type of traffic transmitted over the network. For almost all people, there is only one high speed 'pipe' available to them. The operator should be compensated fairly for operating the pipe infrastructure but they must not be permitted to control who and what can be access or to artificially affect the throughput; just as Ma Bell was obligated to connect people wanting long distance service from Sprint and other providers.

5) Any network services over and above the raw transmission of data through the network should be provided by third parties; without discrimination based on content, source, or destination.

6) Broadband providers should be permitted to inspect traffic only for the purpose of routing it to it's intended destination and not otherwise, scan, store, forward or share it.

In short, Internet Access should be treated exactly the same way that phone service was; after the dismantling of the Bell monopoly.

Subject: Net Neutrality Concerns from an Air Force officer
Lady and gentlemen,

I'm sure your email box is jammed right now but in the event you read this I'd like to express the opinion of a well educated, tech-savy citizen (note I am not representing the Air Force in any way - these are my personal opinions).

In my experience, companies who have near monopolies on providing internet service do not need help maintaining their profit margins. They are already very good at making a profit by false advertising, increasing prices, and not providing better service. They need to be regulated to maintain net neutrality. We pay them to provide us internet access, not decide what parts of the internet are faster than others. Allowing 3rd parties to buy faster service is uncompetitive and prohibits innovation. In addition, I fully believe the incumbent ISPs will not spend the necessary resources to upgrade our already laughably slow national broadband networks to make this "fast lane."

Mr. Wheeler, your quotes say one thing but you do another...perhaps something you learned from working for the ISPs? Allowing rich and poor companies alike to buy preferred service is not anyone's definition of a neutral internet. I hope this helps you make the right decision (please classify the ISPs as common carriers).

Hello,

You all know the importance of the issue of Net Neutrality.

If you recommend/pass language which allows companies to strike deals that would prioritize some Internet traffic over others, this would be crippling for small businesses, start-ups, and the like.

How will "the little guy" possibly compete and innovate, when established companies with huge budgets are able to pay for faster speeds?

Equality. A bit should be a bit and a byte should be a byte. Data should flow at the same rate, regardless of who is sending it.

I ask the FCC to reclassify Internet Service Providers as Title Two Common Carriers. By reclassifying the ISPs as common carriers, the FCC would require that all the ISPs that have laid their own lines rent and out these lines to other companies. This is a good thing because it will create new business opportunities (which means new jobs) for entrepreneurs and investors to jump on. It will also spur innovation in this sector (higher speeds, better and cheaper equipment, etc.). Reclassification will lower prices for consumers and stop the price gouging war that the few ISPs operating in this country currently have going. Most importantly, it will provide competition for the current ISPs, requiring them to adapt or fail. This competition means new ISPs in your area and more choices for consumers.

This game that corporate America plays is only to stuff their pockets while the working class suffers... enough is enough... I should be able to continue to pay a flat rate to use the internet and not have to pay a company like hulu or netflix extra money to get the streaming media to me... it is not fair at what they are trying to do... the internet is open and essentially open sourced and should remain that way!

Once again the proposal to make the internet into a toll-road is being discussed...

What is wrong with our US government to even consider this? Monopolies are a bad idea for the consumer/citizens, and for innovation too. You all know this! We all learned it in elementary school, and it's been proven by the selling out of our country to the highest corporate bidder, piece-by-political-piece.

Stop this piece from sliding down the slope today by preserving Net Neutrality now! Show you're an elected official and not another bought-and-paid-for corporate lackey.

Thank you for taking a stand for right!

To the FCC,

Please don't cave in to these big corporations who only seek to monopolize and control the internet. The internet was made so everyone could have easy access to new knowledge. Having the internet as it is now has hugely benefited our generation and generations to come, but only if you don't cave into the greed of these companies who seek to control more and more of our lives. We deserve to have a free Internet. If you allow this to pass, you will cripple the youth of America and the economy because our youths won't have the same access to Internet and companies will be put out of business if you regulate their foot traffic. Please, Please think of the People of the United States of America instead of a few greedy people.

I believe that all people should have equal access to the internet if they are paying for the service. No telecom company should decide which of their customers has their internet at super high speeds and who has it blocked or very slow. This another example of the rich having so much power to dictate what happens in our world.

I'm writing to encourage you to reclassify internet service providers as Title II common carriers. It's important that the internet stay a level playing field for all content, regardless of origin.

It is essential to the economic health of our country that all have equal access to the internet. Entrepreneurs, students, innovators, communicators, etc. depend on the internet as an essential part of living their life efficiently and productively.

This is true all over the world. We have seen what incredible information, freedom, and sharing access to the internet allows. Restricting speed for any reason does not serve the common good.

Hello,

I don't know why anyone would assume this proposal would be a good thing, but like many Americans, I rely on the internet for a lot of things.

Some of that happens to be important things such as learning new skills, doing research on topics of interest to me, or even keeping up on current events.

With so many people online and using the internet, a proposal like this could have a huge negative impact on people that need the resources that the internet can provide...after all it takes a simple google search for a person that might be out of work or even homeless to try and find a job and a place to live.

I can see this proposal being a horrible thing for students, the average person, small businesses or self-employed people, and a myriad of people in between too.

Think about that for a moment, if you will.

Would you really want to take that essential of a resource away from some of the people that need it most? For a while, we didn't have internet here at home and my mother was having to waste gas (and unwilling cause more pollution in doing so) to go to the public library to do her online college schoolwork.

I know companies that provide internet service need to look out for their "bottom line", but is it really worth sacrificing that insane amount of public benefit?

There are places online where people, provided they have an internet connection, can even go to better themselves by taking free or low cost courses that might help them get a new job or a better job.

If one of the current goals we're supposed to be working towards as a country is getting more people into jobs and off of things like food stamps and such, then wouldn't limiting their access to such an important learning and job seeking tool like the internet be counter-productive?

Dear FCC,

Please understand that the outrage of the American people about the collapse of net neutrality was not unprovoked. We as the American people are sick and tired of corporations getting what they want at the expense of the American people. The cost of bandwidth is getting CHEAPER as time goes by, not more expensive. As more bandwidth exist, and more is created at faster rates the prices drop naturally, this is supply and demand, a simple economic concept. What ending net neutrality ensues is that it is OK to unfairly adjust the market to your own advantage, forcing people to pay MORE money for bandwidth as the value of bandwidth goes DOWN. That goes against all economic principal and moral principle as well. I say this because setting market prices high on low value goods is the same as LYING!! And we will not stand for any more disingenuous business practices with potential to hurt the American people, NEVER AGAIN!! So I'm asking please, just once, do the right thing.

Sincerely,

I am so sick of huge corporations taking advantage of taxpayers and the American public in order to inflate their profits that I constantly consider leaving the U.S. which is more my country than many others born here because of my American Indian ancestry (I am still waiting for an apology for this genocide). I truly believe that America's largest companies including Comcast, AT&T, and other telecom companies need to be reigned in (actually, I believe these huge monopolies should be disbanded and rendered unable to do business anymore). These telecom giants DO NOT OWN the internet. They do not have the right to decide who can benefit from fast Internet speed.

The modern economy would collapse without the internet and American life would be extraordinarily disrupted. It's a simple fact that the internet is a public utility, not a private service. It's time we regulated it as such.

As I saw printed recently, "Journalism is essential for a democracy to function"; so has the internet become a source of information and communication for the citizens of the world. It has worked great for decades now. Any changes giving telecom companies the ability to decide who can benefit from different internet speeds can also decide who can be hindered by them. The last thing we need is for ANY corporation to put a stranglehold on the dissemination of information. I implore you to prevent this from becoming possible.
Thank you.

Much of our nation and the way we live are being forced to change from large corporations who only want what is best for themselves, and they forget the people who put them where they are. The Internet is one of the greatest achievements with relating and relaying info to each other we have. There is no reason to modify it except pure greed and the desire to control. To Mr. Tom Wheeler,

I request that the FCC allow Fast Speed Internet for all consumers equally without the possibility of big Telecom Corporations to slow, or block it for consumers by AT&T, Verizon, and other Telecom Companies! Americans have been exposed to fast speed Internet since home PC were invented. Now consumers have purchased Smartphones or Blackberry phones that have fast Internet Service. Please do not take away this privilege, for the ability for "Freedom of Speech", the ability to join Social Networking sites so people can express their Freedom of Thoughts and Feelings on key important Issues involving The way we receive the Global News, the ability to become a Entrepreneur on U tube, the ability to become a Political Advocate or to Create Petitions to positively affect our Democracy!

Please build any net neutrality argument upon solid legal standing. Specifically, this means reclassifying broadband under Title II of the Telecommunications Act of 1934.

706 authority from the Telecommunications Act has been repeatedly struck down in court after legal challenges by telecom companies. Take the appropriate steps to prevent this from happening again.

The internet is a place where anyone can share ideas, offer services, or provide information. These are just a few examples. But when you give conglomerates power to throttle speeds and price out competition online, you secure a two-sided imbalance that allows companies that offer access and content to starve out any competition. There is no way that could ever be seen as fair enterprise. And you know it.

Net neutrality is something that people enjoy by right, because it's fair and just. It benefits all people, not just those who can afford it, and creates equal access to knowledge and information for ALL people.

To take this away from people would purely serve large companies and in no way serve the people that our government claims to represent.

How could a pay-per-play kind of internet in any way benefit the common people of the USA? How could this possibly be viewed as in the interests of voters?

We see this proposal to kill net neutrality for what it is – a blatant grab for more money by greedy corporations. Those who consider approving will be seen to be putting the corporations before the needs and rights of real people.

The proposal in front of the FCC would allow Comcast, AT&T and other big telecom companies to decide who can benefit from fast Internet speed -- while slowing down, or even blocking, everyone else -- and making millions in profit from it.

The internet should be regulated as a public utility. Private companies should not be allowed to decide who gets access and how.

If the FCC allows the commercialization of what was a free Internet, we will have the destruction of a utility that has allowed unfettered communication and integration throughout the world, a technological development that has revolutionized modern society. To allow more corporate control and further commercialization that will lead to increased fees and more limited access and speed is a tragedy and smacks of severe corruption. I am appalled at the possibility of internet traffic further controlled by corporations...

Your proposed path would open the door to widespread discrimination online. It would give Internet service providers the green light to implement pay-for-priority schemes that would be a disaster for startups, nonprofits and everyday Internet users who cannot afford these unnecessary tolls.

Subject: Let's stop pretending that the internet is a "service"

To Chairman Tom Wheeler and the FCC Commissioners——

The internet is a public utility. We can't live without it and the economy certainly can't function without it. It's time to stop this "fast lanes" and "slow lanes" discussion and move to regulate the internet as a public utility.

Net Neutrality is vital to businesses AND our customers, the only environment we have, and the quality future we all need to not merely survive, but to thrive while doing it.

Micro-business and its impact on economies around the world have soared since the inception of the Internet AS IT NOW EXISTS.

it is past 'unfair' to allow large corporations to be able to decide who will benefit from fast Internet - it is just plain stupid and wrong.

Keep Net Neutrality! As our Elders taught us - don't mess with success!

Thank you for hearing me in a good way now.

Please make sure that internet "fast lanes" will not be legal, and classify internet providers as common carriers. In this day and age, the internet is just as much a utility as water or electricity or phone access and should be regulated as such. If you allow the proposed legislation to pass it will completely destroy the open nature of the internet, and completely stifle innovation and productivity of the entire country.

The majority of the country knows this is a very bad idea, and all you need to do is listen to what the people of the United States are trying to tell you. We do not think a "fast lane" should be created and think that internet providers should be classified as common carriers.

This is exactly the same as how the robber barons, Standard Oil, Armour and others became huge monopolies, crushing all competition--for them it was control of the railroads, rates, routes and preferred treatment. The internet is the railroad/highway of today. Keep it available to all players, no favourites.

DO THE RIGHT THING AND LEAVE THE NET ALONE.

The FCC is supposed to serve the public interest. The current proposal before you is not in the public's interest. Real net neutrality means no "fast lanes" and "slow lanes" on the Internet. It does not mean "pay to play."

Dear Federal Government,

This is urgent: we must keep the internet as an open and democratic arena for communication; it must not be taken over as another arena for profiteering, the corporations that would have this type of change already have ample opportunity for profits in the communications sector.

There is already too big a gap between rich and poor in our country, and making it difficult for those with less to access the internet now would not be a wise direction for our future.

Please keep the net neutral,

Without net neutrality, we are moving closer to the dark times when the free exchange of ideas will be completely crushed under the corporate control of information and ideas, which naturally supports the consolidation of power and capital in those corporations. Those ends are built in, designed for that, with capitalism and corporatism. These systems take no notice of human suffering or environmental health, and have no interest in values other than their bottom lines - profits for shareholders, and the consolidation of wealth in the hands of the powerful. It's built into the system, and if we want this planet to remain habitable and our countries to be about making life sustainable for the people in them, then we need to fight back against this kind of power grab. Ideas and information are power, and if the corporations legislate (through the FCC) that they are the only ones who can have this power then we are all heading for a more naked slavery than the one many of us are already in.

FCC: please do the right thing and keep our internet free and open for all of us - don't kill innovation and democratically shared ideas by favoring the big telecom companies. Thank you.

There are other ways to make money. This is outrageously absurd. We live in a democracy and should be allowed to vote on this as a democracy. I'm tired of paying the price while the rich just keep getting richer. It's time to make a baby step towards equal opportunity for everyone and keep the Internet free for all without restriction for all.

Hi Mr. Wheeler,

I would like to voice my opinion on the Net Neutrality topic.

In today's day in age we have come very far on many topics like segregation discrimination and gay marriage. Even though these topics may not directly relate to Net Neutrality the underlying theme is the same. It should not be allowed for an entity to treat one group differently than another. Allowing through intention or omission the ability to create a discriminatory environment is unethical and immoral. I am a customer that pays his ISP to provide all that the internet has to offer equally. I will no longer have that right if ISPs are allowed to charge for prioritized access. I am sure in the beginning there will be some ISPs that will resist for a short time but most Americans will not have access to them as location will determine what ISPs are available and some of us have only have one choice.

Please do not allow this to happen, please help us keep the internet equal for all.

Thanks

To Chairman Tom Wheeler and the FCC Commissioners——

FCC——

The 21st century internet is an integral part of our economy, democracy, and communication systems. America is absolutely dependent on an open internet operating on net neutrality principles.

As such, you have an obligation to regulate it as a utility. Please assert your Title II authority, and stop trying to appease the telecom giants at the expense of everyone else.

Thank you,

In the age of the internet we have seen an enormous growth intellectually and socially as a species, and this has been largely because a large mentality on the internet is that all ideas can spread equally, in no small part protected by the concept of Net Neutrality. As made clear with the US political campaign landscape, once money can gain a larger venue for an idea, the only ideas heard are the ones with the biggest bankroll, making any average citizen effectively useless. Even this message may not have been able to be sent if it were not for the protection of net neutrality because of conflicts of interest in an ISP carrying a concern about ISPs to people who can control them.

Please protect the flow of ideas, and any potential for economic growth from internet startups, and prevent the US losing it's status as the heart of the internet.

The Internet today is one of the few places where everyone no matter how large or how small has an equal opportunity to become as large as the big guys. If speed is able to be purchased by the big guys, the small guys will have no chance of making their mark. This is how so many corporations today can force out their competition. The Internet is one of the few places where a monopoly is much more difficult to truly achieve because of this speed equality. Without net neutrality the Internet will no long be a free and equal place.

Chairman Tom Wheeler

Dear Chairman Wheeler,

As an Illinois consumer who depends on a fast, affordable web connection, I am concerned that a free and open Internet is now in grave danger.

We are troubled by reports that the Federal Communications Commission (FCC) plans to propose new rules that would open the door for big Internet providers to offer a "fast lane" to the highest bidders. Such a proposal would water down consumer protections, serve as a slippery slope to discrimination against certain web traffic, and force consumers like me to suffer higher rates and slower speeds.

That violates the spirit of "net neutrality."

Please, stand up for consumers, protect net neutrality, and fight for the free and open Internet.

Sincerely,

Lawrence Gluck

Please do not allow the corporate giants the opportunity and freedom to dictate the speed of access to the internet. I remember when Ma Bell had the cost of telephone service so costly I had to choose between milk for my kids and a long distance call across several states. After the monopoly was broken we had options, then innovations which led to progress. Now... they are at it again with the phase "we can offer"... while the true motivation is really all about power and profits.

I go online for information, news, social contact and bank transactions, purchasing of products and med's, contact with my doctor and emergency security. We already pay for the use of both television and the internet. I understand needing revenue to exist... but I do not understand why two profitable companies need to merge to gain the power to control the productivity of the internet. That is a manufactured need, for their own interests not the public's benefit.

Allowing internet service providers to create internet “fast lanes” and “slow lanes” would do nothing more than allow them to extort payments from companies like Netflix. It’s time to admit that the internet is a public utility, not a private “service.”

Dear FCC,

It is my sincere belief that the internet shouldn't be controlled by big businesses that have the power to buy the most bandwidth. This takes equal opportunity away from anybody trying to compete. Without the ability to create anything new, the internet will be stagnant and run rampant with ads crammed down everyone's throat constantly. Besides, whatever happened to the core value of the pursuit of happiness? Isn't it an indirect violation of other's rights to be happy by doing this? We have to draw the line on our rights eventually, and I draw mine here. Do not take net neutrality from me, from us. We cherish the internet. Don't ruin something sacred for the sake of greed.

Equal access to information is pivotal for a functioning democracy.

I strongly urge the FCC to insist that on internet neutrality: telecom companies should not be allowed to determine who can benefit from fast internet speeds, let alone intentionally slowing down or blocking access to others.

To allow them to do so would be to destroy equal access to information.

Subject: Net neutrality is critical to preserving an equal playing field on the internet
Hi,

I'm writing to communicate my great concern and dismay over proposed rules that would allow Internet Service Providers to charge companies with a presence on the internet extra money for access to an internet "fast lane." Allowing ISPs to double-dip like that and charge "pay to play" fees will erect enormous barriers of entry for small tech startups, which have been a major driving force of growth in the US economy for many years. If such rules had been in place 10 years ago, YouTube would not have been able to compete with Google Video, and Facebook would never have been able to gain traction against MySpace.

The internet infrastructure that delivers data to our homes is just that: infrastructure. It should no more have a paid "fast lane" than do our highways, electric grid, or telephone lines. We've recently seen companies with local monopolies, such as Verizon and Comcast, throttle the Netflix service<<http://www.theverge.com/2014/4/28/5662580/netflix-signs-traffic-deal-with-verizon>>, essentially extorting Netflix for additional payments on top of the already high fees<<http://mashable.com/2013/10/28/study-broadband-connectivity/>> that United States ISPs charge their peers and customers. If the proposed rules go into effect, the FCC would be giving the green light to making such extortion commonplace and a standard business practice.

Instead, I urge the FCC to enforce net neutrality as the law of the land, reclassifying ISPs as "common carriers" like the phone companies before them, if necessary. Neutrality is the only way to ensure a level internet playing field as we go into the future.

Thank you.

Regards,
David Mills

To the FCC,

The largest and richest broadband providers like Comcast and Verizon argue that they need more money to invest in new networks. But in reality, they are simply increasing profits by building up monopolies that just benefit their shareholders.

The last thing we should be doing is handing over more power to big companies like Comcast at the expense of consumers. Net neutrality is a cornerstone of the Internet, and it should stay that way.

Keep the Internet free and open to all of us equally.

Be with the majority, the people of this nation, not big corporations.

Please, please, please maintain net neutrality. The big corporations who provide internet service already hold their customers in thrall with ever increasing fees and we do not need to have them limit our access to any website, blog or information. That goes counter to the freedom of speech which we cherish in the United States.

At 76 years old I may not have many more years to enjoy the internet, but succeeding generations such as my children and grandchildren should have complete access without paying extra for it. Please keep the internet free from corporate takeover of information. Thank you,

Allowing telecom companies to profit off of varying internet speeds will grind innovation to a halt, result in countless lawsuits, and be hugely damaging to progress in our country and around the world. Stop letting big companies control everything and profit from every little thing!!!
While friends in so called "less advanced countries" are paying equivalent if $25-30 for 100+ mb of speed!!!!

It's already ridiculous what's going on in the US you can't be serious to give them another fee to charge.... Not only to the consumer but also the provider of digital content online!!

That's like letting USPS, UPS, Fedex, DHL, and any other delivery service out there charge both the sender and receiver for a simple package delivery....

If this goes through, I will have lost faith in the United States system of "freedom" !!!

FCC—

The 21st century internet is an integral part of our economy, democracy, and communication systems. America is absolutely dependent on an open internet operating on net neutrality principles.

As such, you have an obligation to regulate it as a utility. Please assert your Title II authority, and stop trying to appease the telecom giants at the expense of everyone else.

Internet access and providers cannot be allowed to further profitize what is, has been, and should always be considered a public utility-type resource. Pay-to-play mentaliity would further damage our country's educational infrastructure, as well as inhibit small business in favor of the already-established largest corporate carriers. Please reconsider any changes to FCC regulating practices that would create this UN-equal-access situation.

Dear FCC,

It is shameful that on these times of disclosure to end the corruption of the corporations that are ruining this wonderful world where we all live, that you insist on regulating our Internet. I guess our votes don't matter as you have made us believe. One more regulation! as if we don't have enough of this senseless games you play with us Humans while collecting your super salaries.

My Family and I left Cuba in 1960 because my parents did not agree with the communist regimen and wanted to provide me the chance to grow up on a land (USA) where personal freedom, respect and opportunity for an education without indoctrination were still present. And they believed it in the USA being the land of freedom, where dreams of betterment were still in place, they did not realized that this its another form of communism with food and "certain" freedoms.

We are the ones paying for the services that we have chosen and to have your interference in the name of Profit its less than ethical. Its simply immoral.

In the same way that we left Cuba, I can do without a corrupt Internet service that limits our birthright to freedom of choice for have what we pay.

In the same way that I grew up on strange Country and never been back to Cuba, if you insist on the new rules that you are trying to implement I will have no other choice than unsubscribe from this wonderful service.

First and foremost Dear Hearts, don't you have the vision to understand that it is not only for us, the "older" generations, but its also for your children and grandchildren and so on, to enjoy a free Internet without any interference from Comcast, AT&T and other big telecom companies to dictate what we can or can't not do with our money and service of choice, that all they care for its to profit even more than they already do, to decide who benefits or not for a service that WE THE PEOPLE choose to pay for to enjoy.

Wouldn't you like your descendants to be born free, free to choose? Where Truth, respect and integrity rule instead of fear and the corrupt system where we find ourselves in for not fault of our own. It is not enough shameful what the NSA its doing to our own people, and now YOU FCC want to keep pushing boundaries.

In the same way that I don't subscribe to other services that I deemed unnecessary, if this proposal goes forth, you can count out my meager $59.00 per month.
I know its a small amount, but many $59.00 make millions when we pay our bills.
How much money its enough for you? Evidently much more as well as the control that would go hand in hand with the dirty practices of the NSA.

Even major technological companies, investors and members of Congress are slamming this dangerous proposal. Heed to those that still have something decent to say.

I hereby urge to reject the merger and leave our Internet FREE and OPEN.

Sincerely,
Carmen A. Alvarez

I urge the FCC to take whatever actions are necessary to maintain a free, open, "net neutral" Internet.

In a brief 25 years, the World Wide Web has already become one of the most vital forces for free speech and exchange of ideas in the nation and the world today. The Internet's potential power to shape public discourse and bring about positive change is enormous, and must not be hampered by large telecom companies deciding who can and can't have fast connection speeds.

Please vote to keep the Internet open and free.

Sincerely,

I add my voice in opposition to proposed changes that would affect Net Neutrality. Allowing big buisness to gain MORE Controll in a democratic nation is certainly not in the interest of the people. I strongly urge those in position to consider such proposals to decide for free and clear communication. 'Regulated' is not a word included in the amendment which protects our right to freedom of expression.

Net Neutrality is critical to the continuing development of technology. these big companies would like nothing better than to charge for anythng/everything, which will happen if net neutrality is compromised. The arguments they give are bogus and in the long term will severely limit choices unless paying top dollar to a few large firms. It has happened with telephone companies and cable TV companies and that's just a few years after we paid and paid dearly to break up AT&T. Now we're back to where we were before having paid again and again.

Subject: You are destroying this Country.
Do you have a Brain (Who paid you all off?),

This is the beginning of the end for equal opportunity in this country. This country invented the Internet and made some of the most amazing innovations and now with one swipe of the keyboard you destroy it! Like Citizens United this decision will firmly divide the country into the "Have All's" and the "Never Have a Chance's". Lets look back at the history of telecoms. In those days you would pay for the amount of time you spent in a long distance call or the number of words in a telegram. The early days of broadband were the same, you pay for the band-width and can use it in any way you see fit. Now you have opened the flood gates to those who can afford to pay for ala-cart Internet. If you want streaming video you pay one price, if you want gaming you pay another. You people are either "Shit-for-Brains" or just greedy like the Bankers or Politicians in this country. Your job is to serve the public! Not serve those who can pay the most or yourselves! When you allow some to pay for a fast-lane while relegating all other traffic to the slow-lane then you deny the very existence of an Internet that serves everyone. This is single-handedly the most destructive government regulatory decision ever since the advent of the high-tech era. You might as well relegate anyone who is a middle class citizen to the back of the bus only this back doesn't arrive at the same time as the front. It comes in a week late and a Trillion Dollars short! You stupid Troglodytes, can't you see that bandwidth is the only way to regulate this industry. Japan, China, Korea, Singapore, India are all laughing out loud as they see this countries government strangle the very innovation that created the technology in the first place. While we continue to separate the Have's and Have-Not's the rest of these countries continue to kick out ass at education and technology. The data is not whats important, the pipe is. One price for bandwidth irrespective of data.

A pissed off Internet User!

No one except ISPs support this (neither do Google, Netflix, Microsoft, etc.)

The First Amendment-Scarcity argument has gone away for the ISPs due to things like the revelations from E3.

There is no bandwidth issue, it has been invented in order to analogize internet service with Television markets in the regulatory scheme. I have never bought into any conspiracies. This is pure and simple screw-the-consumer-to-make-more-money.

Stop now. Regulate ISPs for what they are, common carriers under Title 1. Stop allowing the ISPs to make even minor packet rerouting determinations. It does not matter what Clarence Thomas and Antonin Scalia think, they don't even know how to use the internet.

Many at the DOJ and FCC are heavily in-bed with or are ex-Comcast golden parachuters. The EU courts have gone the right direction and the FCC WILL EVENTUALLY BEND.

Stop trying to pull the wool over our eyes or waive a stick and say "look over here."

No one agrees with what you are doing. Don't try to tell me that a "fast-lane" isn't changing anything. A large company doesn't get better internet speed by virtue of being big. How many other benefits are you going to grant these large corporations?

ISPs are common carriers. End. Stop.

To Chairman Tom Wheeler and the FCC Commissioners——

Allowing internet service providers to create internet “fast lanes” and “slow lanes” would do nothing more than allow them to extort payments from companies like Netflix. It’s time to admit that the internet is a public utility, not a private “service.”

The internet is central to American life and the modern economy. It makes no sense to regulate it as a private “service.” It is a public utility and should be treated as such.

Please declare the internet to be a public utility

We are already behind other countries in terms of the kind of broadband services available.

I would propose that the United States Postal Service be entrusted with providing universal broadband access to each and every American home.

As such, you have an obligation to regulate it as a utility. Please assert your Title II authority, and stop trying to appease the telecom giants at the expense of everyone else.

What's missing from the Net Neutrality debate is the fact that millions of Americans make their living via the internet using small sites. Allowing corporations to treat one website differently than another will cause widespread economic suffering. Many of these online entrepreneurs are disabled and living on the edge of poverty. One rate change forcing them to pay more for a usable speed would drive them out of business. Government safety nets would then be forced to pick up the slack.

Talk about an EVEN playing field; whatever happened to the concept of "fair play". Oh, I know that s/he who has the gold rules but do you have to be so cruel? Let's see, you ship middle and lower class jobs to less fortunate countries, take away the social safety net, and now you want to take away decent access to anyone who cannot afford to pay more to use the internet and desperately need it to attempt to find employment.

(Did I mention that you have taken away unemployment benefits while at the same time, promoting the very things that make middle and lower class jobs quite hard to find . . . even the fast food, Walmart, etc. jobs!)

I trust you are aware that many people (and not just "liberals") are waking up to the fraud and scams that our so called Congress commits on a regular basis.

Why don't you try a little kindness . . . or, is that too much to ask??

Subject: FCC and your "Fast Lane"
Hello

I am sending this to all contacts on the FCC contact site, and to be quite honest will be surprised if one of you actually read and respond to this email yourself. I won't go on and on about why the proposes are a bad idea because I'm sure you have seen a few complaints already. What I will do is ask you three questions:

- 1.) How is the fast lane fair to those that are lower income, especially education and students who come from said families?
- 2.) What is it exactly that makes you think this is a good thing to do? Don't tell me "cause we want it", or "because it could make stuff better?". We both know that A.) services WILL NOT be cheaper and B.) for some reason your committee is pushing this and it isn't because the general public wants it!
- 3.) Who would honestly benefit from this beside the companies already raking in the money? It sure as heck won't be the common citizen, so I want to know the projected benefits for such a move! Let me know these "benefits" projected in the case of the everyday Joe, small businesses, and education (schools and students at home).

- Now for my final typed item to you is just a statement -

Just to be clear, not that one person and their thoughts matter in today's world to our government, but I am opposed to this decision.

Respectfully,

Subject: Net Neutrality is important!
Dear Commissioner Wheeler:

What are you doing? Seriously...I know you've never been a fan of (and clearly never understood the need for) net neutrality, but you're recent "net neutrality" proposal indicates that you're one of three things: (still) under the thumb of the telecom industry, operating with reckless abandon, or completely out-of-touch. I'm not sure which it, though I suspect the first, but one thing is clear: you are about to permanently and irreversibly change the greatest, most democratic communications medium which has ever existed...and not for the better.

For the love of God, PLEASE STOP. The Internet's greatest strength -- and that which has provided for the greatest (and fastest) innovation -- is that every entity on the 'net plays on a level field. Thus, my personal blog can compete against the New York Times, or Joe's Corner Market has every bit as much opportunity to succeed on the web as does Piggly Wiggly. If you really care about fostering competition -- that is, if you truly care about our capitalistic economy -- you will not proceed with your plan to sell out the Internet to big business. Honestly, there would be no Google today if your plan had been in-place 20 years ago...Microsoft and AOL would have strangled them! There would be no Facebook, no Amazon.com. You are about to kill the free market, whilst it is supposed to be your job to protect it.

NET NEUTRALITY IS IMPORTANT (and I'm underselling it)! If you truly care about this country's well-being more than you care about your former employer's, you must enact rules to protect the sanctity of an open Internet. That means no "slow lanes," yes, but also no "fast lanes." Entities MUST NOT be able to pay for faster delivery of their data packets to end users; this, in effect, creates a "slow lane" for every personal website or small business who is unable to pay what established corporations are able to. If you truly cared about the good of the people, you would spend some time investigating why Americans continue paying the highest cost in the world for Internet Services whilst "enjoying" some of the very slowest connectivity speeds (http://oti.newamerica.net/publications/policy/the\_cost\_of\_connectivity\_2013)...not merely working to line the pockets of the corporations that you used to lobby for.

Mr. Commissioner, this is a very serious and very important issue, and the repercussions of your actions will echo worldwide. Please do what needs done to protect Net Neutrality...what happens over the course of the next few months can never be undone.

Sincerely,

Eric Ewing

Hi,

Except for making the rich monopolies even richer and adding more fees that will be passed onto the consumers, I have not heard any analysis of a two tiered internet with fast and slow lanes that explains why it is a good thing.

I also have not heard any justification for a service as vital to virtually every aspect of modern life as internet access to be in control of profit making companies as opposed to being regulated like other utilities like water and electricity.

Those both would be a good thing to have on your website.

Please do not let this go through. This is at best a breach of neutrality, allowing an ISP to dictate how fast a website loads, and at worst it is an obvious cash grab by telecomm companies. It will drive an even bigger stake through the heart of the now arguably dead middle class and create a rift between Americans socially and professionally. Please do what you can to make sure the net stays free and available to as many people as possible. Thank you.

Dear members of the FCC governing panel,

I would like to voice my support for preserving the neutrality of the Internet. It is important to all Americans that we are able to access equally all internet websites businesses and services. Please do not think that by allowing a few very rich corporations to monopolize a national resource, that it is in any way in the interest of the people of this or any other nation.

Please vote to quash the attempts of those cable companies to compromise the efficacy of one of our most valuable national resources for their own profit.

Please build any net neutrality argument upon solid legal standing. Specifically, this means reclassifying broadband under Title II of the Telecommunications Act of 1934.

706 authority from the Telecommunications Act has been repeatedly struck down in court after legal challenges by telecom companies. Take the appropriate steps to prevent this from happening again.

To be frank I do not know all of the attributes of the impending actions of the FCC, regarding access to the internet. I do know that allowing any entity, other than the public, control of access and variable band width to the public would be as disastrous to free commerce and free speech as turning over the highway system to local tollway operators with private police forces. Access to the internet should be considered a public utility with equal access to anyone. There is already a technology gap between the haves and have nots, which, regrettably, is always the case when access to a resource requires other specialized resources ( use of the inter-state highway system requires some sort of automobile, for example). We should not allow that disparity to become even more explicit by handing the keys to the internet portals to a few and powerful entities that have profit and public opinion manipulation motives, both implicit and foremost, embedded their operational protocols.

Enough! Please start to take into account the concerns of the consumer. We're being abused by big business everywhere we turn.

The U.S internet/cable providers are already providing an inferior, slow product at inflated pricing compared to Europe and the rest of the world.

Now you want to let them regulate and gouge us even more???

I'm in the mid to upper middle class and I can't afford it anymore. It's just ridiculous.

Dear Mr Wheeler,

This is in response to your call for the public's opinions on an open internet, cf. <https://www.fcc.gov/page/fcc-establishes-new-inbox-open-internet-comments> .

I sent you an email before expressing my hope that your proposal would come out in favour of an **actual** open internet, where ISPs cannot differentiate the speeds based on the content provider. I am very disappointed in the "slow lanes" feature of the plan you approved today (officially called "fast lanes" in a consummate example of doublespeak), because it cannot but kill innovative new entrants into the online market landscape.

This plan is a step towards a **closed** internet, and I think the least your commission can do is stop the doublespeak and admit that this puts the interests of established commercial parties above the interests of everyone else.

I am looking forward to your response.

Dear F.C.C. members,

I am greatly disappointed in the proposal for large corporate internet companies to change their ways of operating our services. It has already become a major issue in middle class families, and lower income subscribers to keep their internet services, and still balance their budgets. Since larger companies have started to buy out smaller ones, prices keep going up. I know this is common, but it is unnecessary. Firstly, a company to immediately raise the bill as soon as they buy out a smaller one, without warning is preposterous.

Secondly, the internet is so widely used. It has become a necessity for small businesses, as much as it is for households. It is nearly impossible to apply for a job now, without the use of internet. The job market is still very sparse in most places, and the openings demand more from a potential employee in need of work.

Please weigh the outcome, as I see it will potentially cause more unemployment for this reason. This leads to increased spending for state assistance, our children suffer, and we suffer.

I want the rules on net neutrality to remain unchanged! The Internet is the only public venue where my voice as an individual has the same chance of being heard as the large corporations, as it is they have the resources to shift the story as they wish. All people and corporations should have to share the same net speeds and "lines". I am against this rule change!

I completely support Net Neutrality here in the United States. I am appalled and disappointed with our country and all the politicians implementing the change of America from a country to a corporation. Once again our politicians need to be reminded, this is OUR country, the supposed land of the free? When in reality, our government has been taking control of the people in a more communist way each and every year, very frightening!

Every year we American's have fewer choices, decreased rights, and less and less freedom of speech. Our taxes increase and our rights decrease, and this must stop! Now our politicians want to control the internet and take away something they've already allowed the American citizens to have access to! Our politicians want to revoke our freedom to have the right to know what's happening in our world, and our freedom of speech! As far as controlling and sensing the internet, that has already been done right here in America and approved by our very own wonderful government!

Internet speeds are never what the massive corporations say they are? And Internet companies already have full control of what speed they allow us customers, even if you pay for the fastest speeds - you get what they allow. In my opinion, that is what should be reconciled and dealt with. The massive financial ripoff of millions of American's EVERY year by Internet companies and our government! I am directly speaking and referring to the massive rip off that occurs on a daily basis by these large companies that are working hand in hand with our government.

Unfortunately, the facts are we live in America and the possibility of our politicians and government protecting us from being ripped off by major corporations...Well, that is not happening! As I stated before, corporations run this company, excuse me I meant country not company oops, and not the American people. And the fact that censorship and control over the Internet is already happening just validates my statements. Although the year is 2014, it feels like 1914! We are going backwards as a country - not forwards! I worry for my children and their future with the way politicians are currently running OUR country!

I implore our government and the FCC to not allow this continued form of censorship to happen with this new regulation possibility of the Internet! Why not behave like true Americans? For the first time (in a long time) look out for the American public and not all the corporations that understandably and undeniably pay/run the politicians and a lobbyist.

A thought I'd like to share is I now believe the FCC stands for "Fucking Communist Control" I think that is very suitable for what is now happening. I fear the next thing we will be told is how to cut our hair, similar to North Korea? Hmmmm? I wonder what George Washington would be thinking right now?

My final statement to our government, politicians, and to the FCC, is to stop this insult to the American public immediately! Do not censor or limit our access/speeds regarding the Internet. Stop behaving like we're in a communist country and do not allow more control over the Internet, and as a result, more control over the American citizens!

I am fully aware there are many politicians, but there are many more American citizens! So, please don't forget that! Our government and politicians (including the FCC) should ALWAYS remember this little fact...without all of us American citizens, there wouldn't be an America! So, remember who pays your bills - IT'S THE AMERICAN TAXPAYERS, aka UNITED STATES CITIZENS!

DO NOT ALLOW THIS REGULATION!!!

Thank you for your time and attention to this very important matter.

Please do not brush off the importance that is Net Neutrality. The internet is a space that thrives on being an open community and gives people opportunity to find content they are looking for. We criticize other countries for filtering the internet and blocking their citizens from the content they want. This new proposal would essentially be paving the way to give corporations yet another means to throw money at something and control the population. I don't want to enable major telecom companies to limit my abilities on the internet based on their own personal interests and money making strategies. Please, I beg of you, do not continue to give corporations another way to control us. Keep the internet open and free!

The internet is currently regulated by its users for the mutual benefit of all. The privatization scheme now under consideration represents the closing of a door that has proved essential in the empowerment of those whose voices have too long been silent, for those without access to higher education, for those whose creativity enriches us all. Please preserve net neutrality, and promote public infrastructure improvements to this vital resource.

The Internet is the great equalizer. Anyone with access to a library is able to use it as well as someone who is incredibly wealthy. What you are considering doing will benefit only the big telecommunications companies to the detriment of every individual in the United States. Please for once do the right thing and quit giving everything to the corporations so they can make even more money off the backs of the people. Keep the Internet free.

Please do not pass fast tracking, or any other proposal that would limit a free and open Internet. The Internet, for all practical purposes, is a public utility and should be regulated as such. Taxpayer monies went into its creation, and most members of the public act as though it is as public as the Interstate system. To change that, after allowing businesses and citizens around the world to adapt and become dependent on its current state, is both unfair and dishonest. It will harm small businesses who cannot afford to compete and prevent them from ever being able to compete. And it will hurt users, who will find that some websites are easier to use than others and will therefore rely more heavily on those websites, but will not be informed of the manipulation.

Net Neutrality is the last method we have to get honest news and information out to the masses. The corporate nightmare that offers nothing but infotainment, with nary a drop of news in it's content. Not everything on the net is true obviously, but it gives us a chance to vet our news, see what is happening around the world and not become brain dead fools that have more knowledge about celebrities than items that can affect the world. Don't be fooled by the corporate media, stand up for information!

The internet was designed as a means to connect people to one another both locally as well as globally, NO one has the right to profit from, alter, or regulate that free exchange of thoughts, ideas, and information. In so doing you are at war with all of humanity, you are doing a great disservice to both yourself and the planet. You have NO right to choose what is available to people and what is not, in choosing your selfish desires of profit and control it is only you who will suffer in the end. May you make the right decision :)

To Whom it May Concern,

It is Imperative that equal access at equal speed is left open and available to the internet. Changing this in Any Way will destroy the fundamentals that have allowed business and in turn tax revenues to thrive under a free and open system. Allowing corporations like Comcast to exert any more influence than they already have is a Grave mistake. Any decision in favor of corporations and at the cost of Voters will be reflected in the upcoming elections.

The Internet was conceived not to serve the interests of big industries and it is thence that it derives its value. Allowing a corporate takeover of the Internet would not only restrict competition in the telecom industry by way of anti-trust issues, but would also hurt the thriving web-based startup scene which is responsible for creating so many jobs all over the world.

I beseech you to take a big-picture view of the issue, and go much beyond the scope of this particular trial in your consideration of this issue. The very essence of competition and freedom is at stake here.

Allowing internet service providers to create internet “fast lanes” and “slow lanes” would do nothing more than allow them to extort payments from companies like Netflix. It’s time to admit that the internet is a public utility, not a private “service.”

Dear Mr. Wheeler and fellow Commisioners,

As a citizen of this country, and a paying customer for internet I feel it necessary to express my extreme displeasure with the steps you as a group took to adopt rules that will basically destroy the internet as we know it. To Mr. Wheeler, specifically I say that I am not only disappointed, but have serious doubts about his loyalty to this county. Apparently, that loyalty is for sale, or was always with the cable lobby, not the American people. To the rest of the Commissioners, if you voted to approve making internet service providers common carriers, I applaud your courage, and thank you for your vote. As for the rest of you, you should be ashamed. If you don't understand how data caps, throttling, and pay-to-play schemes aren't terrible for the internet, you don't deserve a place on the FCC, and if you're instead to bought, or too cowardly to do what's right, you certainly don't deserve to be on a commission that holds the fate of the most important infrastructure in the United States since Electricity.

Sincerely aggreived, and certainly unhappy with your decisions,

Hello,

Our current internet setup is fine. Passing this new legislation would do nothing for the people and everything for the ISPs. They'd be charging twice for the same product and worst of all, they'd be able to throttle any site into oblivion. Don't give the ISPs the power to filter the internet.

Dear FCC Leaders,

Net Neutrality is extremely important to the global population. Please do not be swayed by corporate proposals to, in essence, monopolize the internet as we know it.

Many social causes, independent workers, small businesses, and educational platforms depend on access to affordable internet to survive and thrive. Corporations that provide these services already prosper and gain heavy returns on their provider investments. It is out of greed that they would propose to have even more leverage, taking away many opportunities for the greater good and world-wide economy.

Thank you for your consideration and careful evaluation.

Jeremy Oleksa ([REDACTED]) writes:

Dear Mr. Wheeler,

First, I would like to tell you that I am not jealous of your position at all. You are constantly under public scrutiny, and pressured from larger companies with tons of lobbyists. I am not telling you how to do your job. I have a massive respect for your position. Thank you.

I have some concerns about the FCC's proposal and I do not know where to ask, as it hasn't been updated on your website as of this writing. So I thought I would reach out to you.

1. Using Article 706: It has already been established by the courts that the FCC has no authority using this to regulate ISPs. ISPs must be reclassified as a telecom utility using Title II. Anything else leaves any proposal the FCC passes (whether fair or not) up to the judicial courts, thereby negating your work for an open internet. My frame of thought for these ISPs is the fact that they offer VOIP service. If they are offering telephone service, regardless of how they do it, they should be classified as a telecommunications company. That is simple logic to me. ISPs need to be treated like a ubiquitous utility because, simply put, that is what it has become.

Anything else, I look to the debacle about broken fiber cables, and Fire Island, and the non-solution that was originally put in place to save money. It's like a power company saying "here's a 12v battery charger, we don't want to put the power lines back up". Consumers need protection from these types of things still.

2. "Commercially Acceptable": This is a lawyer's dream. Anyone using any amount of statistics can make anything construed as "commercially acceptable". To me, that is just asking for it. I feel that a provision to amend the rules easier should be introduced, as it could allow quick action to close any loopholes in the system. This can also allow for relaxed rules concerning Title II for the ISPs so they can continue to innovate as needed, without government interference, until something shows detriment to the market; which can then be amended. Believe me, if there is something wrong that the ISPs are doing, Silicon Valley will find it :P.

3. Data Caps: There is nothing in my reading of the drafts leaked online about data caps, and that is concerning. I like the idea of paying for speed. If you don't pay for the speed, streaming, gaming, and other services are going to be a subpar experience. As long as people are paying their bills for their bandwidth, they shouldn't be able to be cut off from the internet. People liken internet to things like power, and water, paying for how much one uses afterwards. The thing is, we don't pay for speed of electricity turning on, nor the water pressure. That is the difference. I would be up for an inflating data cap if we had max bandwidth all the time, but it would be speed then cap. It is rigging the system. If I pay for speed, I will hit the cap faster. If we pay for speed; no cap. If we pay for cap; no speed difference. If the ISPs have it both ways, it will end up bad for consumers and small businesses.

In my mind, the consumer wins with "pay for speed, no cap" as it allows ISPs to develop faster technologies, and content providers are not hamstrung with consumers afraid of going over a cap.

4. "Fast Lanes": I understand your thought on this, and how it can benefit the ISPs, and consumers alike. Utilizing something like this has to avoid throttling altogether and can only be beneficial to the consumer if it surpasses the bandwidth that the consumer is paying for (side note, do we EVER get the speed as advertised from our ISPs?). They also can't be gouged to tears, only an upping of speed on content providers' end. I don't know if you experienced this; I paid for 50mbps on Verizon FiOS, as I moved to New York. I fired up Netflix to see how good it handled. The resolution was less than that of standard definition. That to me is unacceptable. I then checked speedtest.net, and it said I was receiving my proper speeds. The only thing I can think was happening was throttling. I feel that we should always be getting the posted speed to all content, or what the ISP can muster at that point. None of this "last mile" stuff. If the content provider wants the ISP to deliver their content even faster than the bandwidth the subscriber is paying for, that should be the content provider's free decision, not a necessity developed by the ISPs because they throttle the content provider's bandwidth to their own subscribers.

Those are my concerns. Ultimately this is up to you and the other commissioners. I also know that there is not a solution where both sides will be happy, only a solution where one side is happy, the other is not, or both sides are considerably unhappy.

I really hope you read this amongst the sea of other emails you receive on a daily basis.

Thanks,

-Jeremy

Subject: Say No to Fast Lanes and Protect Net Neutrality!
Dear Mr. Wheeler,

I am terribly disappointed in the FCC over your recent Net Neutrality Proposal!! What you have put forward has the potential to destroy the free market of the internet as we know it. If you would like to hurt the US economy and small businesses everywhere you are most definitely succeeding. While you state that you don't support these "fast lanes" you also do nothing to include language to ban them. You have taken the weakest stance possible on the issue and are playing to pass the blame game on to someone else. How about you stand strong on the issue and say no to fast lanes and do what is right and what the people want. Pay-to-Play is not an option the American people are willing to accept. If anything we should be reclassifying broadband as a utility!!

Subject: Support net neutrality not corporate monopolies
Letting Internet Service Providers charge different rates for different customers might not be so terrible for consumers if not for two major problems.

1. ISPs are effectively monopolies. I have one and only one choice for internet where I live. My provider has no incentive to provide good service or charge me a reasonable rate. I don't live in a rural area either. I live in Kansas City, the largest Metropolitan area within 250 miles.
2. Conflicts of interest in all directions. Allowing Cable companies to provide internet is a HUGE conflict of interest. Streaming video on the internet has already made cable TV an obsolete technology. But in order to do it, I have to get service from my cable company. Cable companies have a strong incentive to limit internet bandwidth speeds and limit content available. They have done an excellent job of doing both of these things.

Allowing cable companies to limit bandwidth they don't like would be like letting a gas station own the street in front of your house. When you try to get gas from another gas station, lanes get shut down and traffic reduces to a crawl.

Stopping this won't fix our countries internet problems. You have a lot of work to do to create incentives for improvement and remove conflicts of interest. Stopping this will keep our internet problems from getting worse.

Stop making things worse. -joe

To Chairman Tom Wheeler and the FCC Commissioners——

Net neutrality principles are of the utmost importance and anything violating open internet principles is unacceptable. The FCC should use it's authority to regulate the internet as a telecommunications service to protect consumers and enshrine Net neutrality.

I am very concerned about any paid prioritization or proposed "pay-to-play" rule—destroying Net neutrality principles is not an option. This new rule will change the nature of the equal and open internet, while creating real barriers to entry that will stifle innovation.

The internet is the great equalizer of our society, to move forward with these new rules is ignorant and to be quite frank, stupid. It is a grave threat to the internet as we know, to small businesses, and to all users. The rules are unnecessary, and the logic that they allow for innovative business models is asinine because it destroys the ability for innovators to come up with new products. Allow people to innovate for the good of our economy, not to make the rich richer.

The ever enlarging ISP's (Comcast, etc.) should by all rights be classified as Common Carriers.

I have noticed over the past approximately six months that Verizon is limiting speeds and/or access to its users. It is getting gradually worse, with the past two days being most irritating.

My request is that you please check into this. ISPs are under your purview, so please exercise your ability here. I am sure you will find that Verizon is manipulating speeds for "hard-wired" customers.

It is time to do the right thing for the people of the USA and say no to the proposed changes to the net. Internet service providers are as important to our national security as telephones were in the last century and should be treated as public carriers. These are technologies we the people paid for and developed and should not be given away to companies that would then charge us to use technology that they got from us. I understand that Tom Wheeler was once a paid lobbyist for telecoms so to Tom I say directly, this, "Tom, you've been a big player in the telecom business up till now but its time for you to cut the apron strings and do the right thing for the American people and the the World."

Subject: "Fast Lanes" would hurt the Open Internet

Chairman Wheeler is correct with his statement that "There is one Internet. Not a fast internet. Not a slow Internet. One Internet." Any system by which certain content may be deliberately slowed down will have a direct, lasting, and strongly negative impact on the Internet as a whole. In particular, small businesses won't be able to pay to have their content delivered at the speed the customer expects, even though those customers are already paying their ISP for a certain quality of service. New companies will also find it extremely difficult to get started, which will damage innovation.

End the legal wrangling over the Internet for good: Reclassify ISPs as Title II Common Carriers so that everyone, including consumers and businesses, can be assured of receiving quality service without being subject to additional fees to get what they've already paid for.

Dear FCC ~

Net neutrality, the principle that Internet service providers (ISPs) should treat all data that travels over their networks equally, is important to me because without it ISP's would have the power to determine my internet experience by providing better access to some services, while restricting access to others. These regulations would inevitably result in a less diverse and less accessible internet.

A pay-to-play Internet worries me because it is counter-intuitive to the existence of a free, unrestricted, and unlimited resource, available to everyone equally.

I am an artist and curator in Seattle, WA, and I rely on the internet to reach artists, galleries, viewers, and potential clients that I'd have no way of contacting solely by word-of-mouth in the physical world. A free and unrestricted world-wide network is absolutely vital to the exchange of information, technology, ideas, and innovation. It's also an invaluable resource for emerging entrepreneurs and small businesses that don't have advertising budgets to match the corporate conglomerates.

An internet with net neutrality creates a forum where everyone has equal access, and where everyone can communicate on equal ground. The 1st Amendment of our Constitution states that "Congress shall make no law... abridging the freedom of speech." By eliminating net neutrality, the FCC would be violating our right to free communication by deciding that some words (websites, advertisements, etc) have more value than others simply because the people behind them can afford to pay more.

everyone but just how functional will it be. If, like so many other things, you can't afford to pay extremely high rates for the fastest speeds you will be virtually left out; again.

The internet is probably the only thing we citizens have that places us on par with the wealthy and the not-so-wealthy. Education is the same, the information we have access is the same, opportunities are the same.

Take away our ability to be equal, again because of income, and you perpetuate a class division that grows daily. You don't have to be a contributor.

Protecting net neutrality protects the general public from being even more ripped off by the ISPs than they already are. Many countries across the world and especially in Europe are better enforcing these ideals than they have previously, yet this country seems to consistently go backwards when it comes to this issue. Make no mistake, if internet providers like Comcast get their way, they will absolutely gouge the consumer more than they are already doing, and start going after websites as well. Creating "fast lanes" isn't going to benefit the consumer, it never will. Internet providers should never get to decide what goes through their cables faster or slower since their services for transmitting data was already paid for.

Subject: Open internet (14-28)

Commissioners
445 12th St, S.W.

Washington, D.C. 20554

May 15, 2014

Dear Chairman Wheeler, and Commissioners Clyburn, Rosenworcel, Pai, and O’Rielly:

I have been following with interest your ongoing proceeding on how best to re-implement the “net neutrality” rules. Like you, I believe it is critical that we maintain a free and open Internet, where consumers are not blocked from accessing the websites of their choice and providers do not use their control over the last mile to stifle competition.

As you consider how best to move forward to achieve these goals, I write to share my concerns with reports that the Commission may not be considering achieving these goals by reclassifying broadband Internet access service as a “Title II” common carrier service. In recent years, after the initial build-out, that broadband service has been subjected to relatively little regulation. Investment, competition and deployment have dwindled and broadband consolidation and service rates have increased, all to the detriment of consumers and the American economy.

While we still have further to go to ensure that the benefits of broadband reach all Americans, I am convinced that opening the door to subjecting broadband service to some regulatory oversight, i.e, imposing Title II, is the only way to ensure this progress. I respectfully urge you to consider the effect that reclassifying to a Title II approach will have on private companies’ ability to exact extortionate fees from content providers and last mile customers. Their huge profit margins already ensure they have sufficient capital, and should be enough incentive, to continue to invest and innovate. Consider as well, the potentially huge positive impact on job creation that might result from any new innovations or next-generation infrastructure investment. I share your goals of keeping the Internet open to all. I whole-heartedly believe that a Title II approach is the best means of achieving this goal for our country.

Thank you for your work on this very important issue.

Sincerely,

Jeff Carrick,

Constituent of:

Congressman Mike Kelly,

Senator Pat Toomey,

Senator Bob Casey

Please fight as hard as you can to protect the open and equitable availability of the internet. Do not allow internet service providers to charge "tolls" to allow websites to get their content to consumers, or allow ISPs to slow down certain websites or content as they see fit. Any attempt to do so would be a blatant sell-out to big business and is not the in the public's best interest. The internet should be available to everyone. I encourage you to classify the internet as a public utility. So many people are using it now and it is such a necessity to so many people's lives that it can hardly be considered anything else.

Protect consumers, allow open and equitable access to all content, don't sell out to big companies whose only motive is profit. The people of America deserve better.

If you haven't watched this video I ask that you'd look at it. I watched it and I don't know the "other side of the story" and since I doubt you have time to give me your thoughts on the accuracies/inaccuracies of the video, I'm writing this just in case it's generally accurate. I'm asking that, as you make decisions about net neutrality, you consider the needs of the consumer and the general business climate you want to have in America.

I think a business should find success by producing high quality products, not through their efforts in lobbying the government for special favors. I don't want to live in a country where people who want to find success know to ignore consumer opinions and focus on obtaining government favors instead.

I know good things take careful maintenance and can too easily fall apart. I want to tell you that a distinctive I don't want to see us lose is the general belief that success comes from hard work. Please consider this as you make your important decisions. Thank you!

Dear Mr Wheeler;

I read a quote today regarding your approved plan on Net Neutrality, wherein you state, "There is one Internet. It must be fast, it must be robust, and it must be open...The prospect of a gatekeeper choosing winners and losers on the Internet is unacceptable."

It sounds to me, based on the plan, that you are currently said gatekeeper you argue against. Allowing this current plan to go through paves the way for future exploit by companies of products and services that they pay for. Whether this will immediately be the case, or a slow progression is arguable. But one thing is clear, allowing anyone to have the power to control your availability to gain knowledge and information will lead to exploitation where every citizen loses.

I urge you to do the right thing, as civil servants are here to protect society and it's citizens, not corporations. The citizens that do not run a corporation are in the majority and should be protected more so because of their potential to be exploited and used by said corporations. You have the choice of fighting for the people you serve and being remembered, or for falling in line like a domino and serving only yourself and your own interests. Please do the right thing for everyone.

As a customer of Comcast, I already have concerns over their growing empire and I do not wish to grant them any further power. In addition, I believe giving the ISPs the ability to determine that certain web sites will cost customers more dollars is a mere sham that undermines the very freedom in which the Internet was invented. I believe that by not allowing the Internet to remain neutral, you will create hardships for new start-ups in technology, of whom we have yet to discover.

Please, keep the Internet free and neutral.

The issue of "Net Neutrality" is so simple that over 9,000 people get it. ISP's must be called what they are, not what they want to be. ISP's are Access Providers/"Common Carriers" and NOT Information Providers. There are plenty of sources providing information, yet to get to it you have to have an ISP give you access, hence "Access Provider". This is not complicated. To preserve an open & free (as in freedom) internet we must reclassify ISP's as COMMON CARRIERS. So do it or you don't get any cake.

Your proposed path would open the door to widespread discrimination online. Dear Chairman Wheeler,

Is this going to be your legacy? That under your watch America was lessened?

Your plans to neuter the freedom and neutrality of the internet will hamper innovation and lower the average Americans standard of living by making America's already slow and expensive internet even slower and more expensive.

President Obama promised to protect internet neutrality. If you go forward with your plans that will only help the big guys, I will call on the President to fire you. You will prove that you are not serving the public but rather your pals in the industry from where you came.

Please do the right thing with the power invested in you. Leave the internet neutral.

Sincerely,

Net neutrality, the principle that Internet service providers (ISPs) should treat all data that travels over their networks equally, is important to me because without it against innovation, against consumers best interests and against infrastructure growth

A pay-Àto-play Internet worries me because new, innovative services that canâ€™t afford expensive fees for better service will be less likely to succeed.

Rarely do I get involved on issues but I feel strongly about some of the recent net neutrality decisions. so to make it easy to submit our voice i compiled some links. You current proposed solution is no solution at all . It is capitulation and kowtowing to the powers that pay.

We are already behind other nations in Internet infrastructure and pay the most for the least . Stop the big comm from innovating ( when they can squash bandwidth needs why improve infrastructure ? and make money doing it ) and squash the small guys from innovating directly by pricing them out and preventing competition. Bad for the consumer and the future of tech. the FCC MUST designate Internet services as public utilities like most other major country in the world .

Subject: Net Neutrality
??Dear Mr. Wheeler,

The FCC is currently considering measures to allow so-called Internet "fast lanes," which would allow certain companies to pay to receive additional speed. The beauty of the Internet, as we currently know it, is that anyone, from any walk of life, is able to access information. Whether rich or poor, we all have access to the same resources, knowledge, and information at our fingertips. Without net neutrality, internet providers become internet deciders.

If Internet providers are able to determine which sites can be functionally used and which can be marginalized, then that will be the end of the Internet as we know it. That may sound dramatic; however, it's very true. These "fast lanes" are a slippery slope to total Internet control by large corporations—control over what information is disseminated, how it is disseminated, and to whom. By allowing the large corporations to purchase "fast-lane" speeds from providers, you are, in essence, silencing small businesses, struggling companies, and startup competition who can't yet afford such a "toll-road shortcut."

Broadband access and the Internet need to be classified as a Title II telecommunications service or a public utility.

Please consider doing the right thing for the freedom of the Internet, now and in the future. I would hate to be known as the generation the killed the Internet, and I'm sure that you wouldn't want that dubious honor yourself.

Sincerely,

Jennifer Russo

Mr. Wheeler,

By giving the telecom industry the green light to extort internet content providers, you are creating an environment which will stifle free - thought and destroy thousands of small businesses which operate exclusively on the Internet who do not have the money to pay for access to a "fast-lane".

In so many places throughout the country, telecom companies such as Verizon, Comcast, TWC, etc already function as monopolies. Now in light of the proposed TWC/Comcast merger being discussed in Congress, your organization is planning to give these companies even more power.

How can I be sure you are doing what is right for the American people? Your history with the Cellular Telecommunications & Internet Association is quite worrisky. Please prove to me and the rest of the American people that you are in fact NOT in the pocket of the telecom industry and reclassify ISPs as utilities. That's all I ask. Give the Internet created by the people's government back to the people.

Subject: small business that helps teachers via the internet
Hello,

I'm writing to you in my role as the owner of a small company. We produce a platform called Edthena which helps teachers get better at teaching. We do this utilizing recorded videos. As such, this is a bandwidth intensive activity compared to other types of small web companies.

Our customers are organizations who train teachers -- like the University of Michigan, University of Washington, and even George Mason Universty -- and our users are the teachers themselves.

I'm deeply concerned about the idea of a fast-lane and slow-lane of the internet. Such a system would place a company like us in jeopardy from being able to provide our services at a low cost.

Quite simply, we do not have the means to pay extra for access to a fast lane. Nor do our customers have the means to pay extra from their ISP in order to watch themselves on video and get coaching.

I understand much of the rhetoric around this issue focuses on companies like Netflix. But the reality is that these proposed rules will hurt small businesses like mine. It's my belief that the FCC exists to help protect open access and free communication, and that is why I wanted to have my voice heard.

Please feel free to contact me should you have further questions about my position.

It is of the utmost importance that internet service providers are not allowed to discriminate against websites based on their content. In a country founded on the ideals of democracy, but continually misinformed by mainstream media, the internet remains the public's only source for “unregulated<<http://www.thenewamerican.com/tech/computers/item/18141-memo-reveals-clinton-white-house-paranoia-over-free-internet>>” information. And it is precisely this “unregulated” information that keeps the public well-informed. Subject: Let’s stop pretending that the internet is a “service”

To Chairman Tom Wheeler and the FCC Commissioners——

The internet is a public utility. We can’t live without it and the economy certainly can’t function without it. It’s time to stop this “fast lanes” and “slow lanes” discussion and move to regulate the internet as a public utility.

To the FCC,

I'm writing to encourage you to reclassify Internet service providers as Title II common carriers. It's important that the Internet stay a level playing field for all content, regardless of origin. I am against the idea of any one content provider having any advantages over another.

The Internet is truly our last great bastion of free creativity, information and ideas, but in order to remain that way, it must stay a level playing field. Deep-pocketed corporate interests have no business infringing on that via "fast lanes."

Subject: Keep the internet OPEN, Fast lane Means no innovation!

Dear Tom,

You will most likely never see this email, but please, for the love of the innovation PLEASE do not go forward with your plans for a closed internet. A "fast lane" as you call it, will only give the ISP's (which are a monopoly anyway) more power, and destroy many startup's who do not have the capital to gain access to the broadband speeds they require.

I am a professional in the tech field, and seeing this happen would most likely force me overseas to find work. I hope you try to keep the spirit of innovation in the USA, because it sorely needs it.

Thanks for a whole lot of NOTHING so far,

Good afternoon,

I am writing to express my extreme displeasure with the Net Neutrality prioritized traffic ruling today.

I am personally against any sort of prioritized traffic in ANY sense and think that it should be banned completely. Furthermore, the FCC needs to declare internet providers as "common carriers" using Title II. If this does not happen I will be petitioning my congressional representatives to call for the resignation of Tom Wheeler.

Thank you,

I disagree with Mr. Wheeler's proposed "Open Internet" plan.

This plan is not in the interest of the consumers and benefits only the telecom companies.

It does nothing to promote competition, innovation, or investment, and will not benefit the economy.

Plus the very fact that you have had to change your voice automation to request that people send you an email that clearly shows that the public does not agree with these proposed rules.

I have read his blog posts defending the plan, but expedience is a poor reason for implementing a horrible framework. No matter how you spin it, if most users get one level of access to the Internet, while those with the means to pay for it get expedited priority access, it IS a divided Internet, and it is the exact opposite of net neutrality.

Declare broadband AND mobile Internet providers utilities, and assert the authority of the FCC to oversee and regulate the industry while maintaining an actual open Internet.

Subject: New Rules on Internet

To Whom It May Concern,

I have followed the discussion of the proposed rules allowing internet providers and content providers tro strike commercial deals to allow some content to be delivered more quickly and with fewer problems with grave concern. This strikes me as a dreadful proposal. We, in the United States, should not allow commercial enterprises to privilege some content over other content strictly on the basis of money. The very notion undermines the concept of an "entrepreneurial economy."

I am also concerned that the proposed rules do not adequately address a more fundamental issue of internet service in this country, namely the slow speed of our internet. I have lived in or visited a number of countries in Europe and I am frequently shocked not only by how inferior our internet service is but the high cost of our internet service. There should be no more than a nominal fee for internet service in a country that is increasing relying on the internet to enhance our educational opportunities, our government services, and our private enterprises. Frankly, the internet now has far more in common with utilities than with, for instance, network broadcasting; they should, therefore, be governed by rules similar to those governing utilities.

Please, do not proceed with the current proposed rule changes.

Sincerely,

Peter J. Schertz

Subject: Killing the Internet
Dear FCC and Tom Wheeler,

Thanks for falling into the pockets of Verizon and Comcast and betraying the consumers of The United States of America. Your proposed rules will kill innovation and stop any startup trying to make it on the Internet. The big guys like Verizon and Comcast do not want anyone else to challenge/compete with them and you guys are making this even more possible by your "fast lane" proposal, which is absolutely wrong. As an IT professional I feel that you guys don't even know the first thing about the Internet and yet you guys are allowed to make rules about it and allowing greedy Verizon and Comcast to have it their way allows them to stomp any competition that they may have in the future and make more money off of data usage.

Why do you think The Internet is the way it is today? The speed it has grown and expanded and made our lives a lot easier. The answer is that Net Neutrality allowed those big companies to be where they are today, and now you are crippling innovation and us, the consumers will pay for your mistakes.. You do realize their whole plan is to impose data caps everywhere in order to get their greedy hands on more money. If their argument is that they can't keep up with the demand, than they should just give up and shut their doors. They must have a bunch of inexperienced Network Engineers to not be able to handle the traffic, or they just don't want to pay for equipment out of greed. This isn't a home network with a Linksys router, you need to keep up with the demand of your paying customers and that means setting up and maintaining more network equipment to handle the demand, not impose data caps and put in Slow Vs.Fast lanes to bandaid their horrible networks.

I will be leaving Verizon and never doing business with Comcast if I can help it and will never do business with them again. Their incompetence and greed is killing The Internet and you guys won't do anything to stop it, I am very disappointed.

Not that you'll even read or care about what I write, but I am very upset with the direction you are setting the Internet on, this is the wrong move and will leave us further behind the European nations than we already are.

Sincerely,

Murat Ozdemir

What Tom Wheeler is proposing in his latest version of net neutrality rules, which allow "gatekeepers" to charge different rates for access to consumers on "fast and slow lanes" is the exact opposite of what we the people of the U.S.A. need. Instead we true net neutrality and open access. Companies, such as Verizon and Comcast, should not be internet gatekeepers and should provide equal access and bandwidth. Christopher Gorski ([REDACTED]) writes:

Dear Mr. Chairman:

I am a concerned computer professional, and I will keep this short and sweet. In the current issue of regulating internet traffic, I want you to consider nothing less than regulating internet service providers as a Title II common carrier.

The internet is intrinsically difficult to regulate, but it is definitely the case that most Americans do not have multiple reasonable choices for broadband internet access at their homes. The 'final mile' of wire or fiber going from a distribution network to a user's home is terribly expensive to install, providing a very high barrier for entry and making it difficult for there to be a competitive market in any real sense: if I live in a place only served by Time Warner and I don't want to do business with Time Warner, my only choice may be to cancel my service and not have broadband at all, rather than go to a different company which offers similar levels of service (as I might do with most types of business).

As such, it may be in the financial interests of ISPs to not be regulated as a common carrier, but since there is no real free market, it is NOT in the interests of the end users: it only facilitates apathy towards customer issues and lackluster growth. Mr. Chairman, the internet was born in the United States, but we are currently (as of information from last year) in ninth place worldwide in broadband, behind not only South Korea, Japan, and Hong Kong, but also the Czech Republic and Latvia. Unregulated monopoly business practices are clearly not helping our innovation.

Allowing 'fast lane' access is a sham, as well: There is no way to create a separate pipe from (say) Netflix to a user's home--the nature of the internet is to allow all the traffic to be routed together. What they're really proposing is to upgrade (maybe) their original network, then shut down traffic from companies that don't offer them sufficient kickbacks. Effectively they want to have permission to charge me for my internet service, ask my content providers to pay for them to upgrade (maybe) their networks, CONTINUE to charge my content providers for the one-time upgrade forever, and artificially restrict traffic that comes from companies not offering kickbacks.

And it is no less than a kickback, Mr. Chairman: if I am paying my internet service provider for a certain amount of bandwidth, keeping traffic that I request off of the wire that I am renting from them is fraudulent. The ISPs are already paid (by me, and millions of other end users) for their services. Suggesting content providers (who also pay massive ISP fees for their connections) need to pay to use the other end of the same network is just turning a blind eye to someone on the take.

Internet service providers have always, since the usage of the internet became commonplace, played the role of a common carrier. It is time to regulate them as such.

Thank you for your time.

Subject: Net neutrality and an open internet
Dear Mr. Chairman:

I am a concerned computer professional, and I will keep this short and sweet. In the current issue of regulating internet traffic, I want you to consider nothing less than regulating internet service providers as a Title II common carrier.

The internet is intrinsically difficult to regulate, but it is definitely the case that most Americans do not have multiple reasonable choices for broadband internet access at their homes. The 'final mile' of wire or fiber going from a distribution network to a user's home is terribly expensive to install, providing a very high barrier for entry and making it difficult for there to be a competitive market in any real sense: if I live in a place only served by Time Warner and I don't want to do business with Time Warner, my only choice may be to cancel my service and not have broadband at all, rather than go to a different company which offers similar levels of service (as I might do with most types of business).
